The principal item that is causing excitement deals with cold storage bacon. The term "cold-storage" is not defined, and the public is allowed to make its own definitions. As all Bacon in a packing house is under refrigeration it is really all cold-storage, and therefore this Company's figures of cold storage Bacon represent the complete quantity of Bacon handled in its entire Plant, whether in freezers or in process of cure for immediate shipment. That some companies interpreted cold-storage product as "freezer" product only is evidenced by the smallness or entire lack of figures on the Bacon list for some Plants, indicating that many Firms did not submit statements of their complete stocks, as did this Company. An Official of this Company pointed out this cold-storage distinction to Mr. O'Connor and Miss McKenna in Ottawa a few weeks ago, and the failure to make the distinction after having had it pointed out evidences lack of desire for accuracy of the real information desired.

It is true The William Davies Company, in 1916, exported 97,791,000 pounds of Bacon, but we do not know how the margin of 5.05 cents per pound is arrived at by Mr. O'Connor, as there were no figures to justify such a conclusion. The probabilities are that the margin is arrived at by taking the average cost per pound of incoming product from the average selling price per pound of outgoing product. This may be a rough way of estimating the gross margin when dealing with small figures, but when dealing with figures the size that Mr. O'Connor has to deal with, a very small fraction of a cent per pound of error makes a very important difference in the total, and one must be careful to make sure that the outgoing product is the same finished merchandise of the incoming product reported on.

Allowing it to pass, however, as a rough estimate, we wish to point out—(first)—the inquiry of the Commissioner allowed only for incoming freight and unloading charges, and made no provision whatever for operating charges of any kind, such as labor, curing materials, refrigeration, et cetera. Such actual charges on the 97,791,000 pounds exported were $1,162,000—or 1.2 cents per pound. This amount covered all charges up to the point of placing the Bacon on cars f.o.b. packing house. In addition to this was the actual cost to land and sell this 97,791,000 pounds in England after leaving the packing house, which involved charges of 2.9 cents per pound—or $2,836,000. Thus 2.9 cents per pound included inland and ocean freight, landing charges, war and marine insurance, cables, and selling commission to agents. The ocean freight and war risk alone would make up 2.4 cents of the charge of 2.9 cents per pound. This 1.2 cents, plus 2.9 cents—a total of 4.1 cents—must be deducted from Mr. O'Connor's margin of 5.05 cents per pound, leaving a margin of .95 cents, or slightly less than a cent per pound, which still has to be reduced because of the error of premises and because of further factors which have to be considered to determine net profits.

It is quite evident some of the other packers did not show selling values in the country in which the goods were sold—a proceeding quite proper, as the forms submitted to be filled in were indefinite and ambiguous, thus permitting without charge of evasion a variety of interpretation as to the information required. It is thus possible that of all the figures submitted by the different packers that no two sets of costs and sales prices are determined at the same common point. It is this difference of interpretation of what was required that accounts for the difference of the alleged "margin" made by the different companies. Common conclusions, however, have been drawn by the author of the report from varying bases of premises.

The figures of the Egg business were submitted on the same basis as Bacon, and similar deductions must be made.

(Second)—The above margin is further reduced in that the author of this inquiry singled out the Bacon figures as an item in which the selling price shows an alleged improper advance over cost, but he did not give us credit for the statements of other products, of which figures were submitted the selling prices of which were under cost. The reason of this was that through failure to inquire the Department entirely overlooked the fact that product may come in as pork and, through the process of manufacture, go out as Bacon or, in another instance, enter the factory as beef and go out in the form of canned meats; for example: much of the product which came in as pork, and which was entered on the pork sheet submitted to the Commissioner—about which he makes no mention—was cured and left the factory in the form of Bacon, and was, therefore, entered on the outgoing side of the Bacon sheet—the result is that the Bacon sales are increased by this amount over the incoming stocks of Bacon, and, likewise, the sheet showing sales of pork is reduced by the amount that went out in the form of Bacon. If the Department takes one set of figures that show favorable to the Company they should take another set of figures that show unfavorable, as the principle in either case is the same, and failure to do so looks as if the author of the report was exercising more enthusiasm than sound judgment in his investigations.

(Third)—It is queried in the report, that "if the margin of 3.47 cents," alleged to have been made in 1915, "was satisfactory, why was it necessary to show increased margin in 1916?" Assuming again for the moment the soundness of the premises in asking such a question based on an erroneous "margin", it will be found that the increased margin is chiefly absorbed in increased ocean freight rates and war risk insurance in 1916, of which apparently the author of the report was in ignorance.

The Company does not challenge either the legal or moral right of the Government to investigate business enterprises when public interests directs such an investigation should be made. If an investigation of the packing and meat business is ordered, the Company will place at the disposal of the Government not only the data it would be required to supply under Order-in-Council directing that inquiry be made, but will place the experience of its officers at the disposal of the investigating committee, if it is considered they can render any service which will be of value. The Company has not now—nor at any time during the fifty years of its operation—anything to conceal in method or practice of carrying on its business. It does, however, claim the right to conduct its export business without abusive comment from Government civil servants—especially when the conclusions drawn from the data asked for are improper and false.

One of Canada's chief export industries is the packing business. It is essential to the live stock industry, and, along with other export industries, it maintains the financial stability of this country, and should, providing it is on a sound basis, receive encouragement and not slanderous abuse. In view of the publicity given to the report of the Commissioner on the cost of living, the Company demands the same publicity in having an official Government investigation of this report to determine the truthfulness or untruthfulness of its conclusions. We do not seek public consideration as a company, but we do say that untruthful official statements, or statements the effect of which is to create an untruth, adversely affect the live stock industry of this country, which is so valuable and essential a wealth-producing power and, in the long run, are harmful to the very people that the statement seeks to benefit.

If the passing out of existence of a corporation such as The William Davies Company, or if nationalization of packing houses would materially and permanently reduce food prices, then in view of the present world tragedy it ought to be consummated without delay. The fact of the matter is, however, that with millions of people in Europe turning from producers into consumers because of the war, and the tremendous destruction of food products incident to war, there is no remedy for the high prices of food while such conditions last, except the remedy of thrift and increase of production.

Long before there was talk of a Food Controller in the United States or Canada The William Davies Company urged the Government at Ottawa, in writing, to appoint a Food Controller with full power to do what he saw fit, as we realized at that time the upward tendency in the price of food commodities unless checked by official effort. At the most a great deal cannot be done in reducing food prices while currency is inflated and until the scale of prices of all kinds of commodities declines also. What can be done can only be done by a Food Controller. We wish to point out that nothing at all can be accomplished unless the data secured are accurately and clearly made and the deductions therefrom sound. Only public harm arises from dangerous incompetency in the haphazard collection and careless use of important figures.

As far as The William Davies Company is concerned this terminates all public statements of the Company, and it will pay no more attention to speculative and haphazard statements made either by newspapers or civil servants. The only further statement that will be made will be at an official investigation.

Menace To Merchants

The Telescope recently printed an article from an Orangeville paper stating that the T. Eaton Co. were considering opening branch stores throughout Ontario. Commencing on this article the Simcoe Reformer says: "If the Eaton Co. is really planning such an invasion of the towns of Canada as is feared by the Orangeville paper it promises to become to the retail mercantile trade of Ontario quite as much of a menace as is Germany to the world It will surely be up to those whose business existence is at stake to devise ways of meeting the menace. And by co-ordinated action the retail merchants should be powerful enough to accomplish something worth while. Here is a suggestion: Why not unite on a demand on the government for a re-arrangement of the business tax so that Toronto does not get it all, but that it is divided fairly? If Simcoe sends $100,000 worth of business to Eaton's in a year, why should not that business be made to pay to Simcoe its fair share of lighting Simcoe, maintaining Simcoe's streets and Simcoe's schools? The Simcoe merchant has to pay towards these things. If a business tax at all, why not an equitable one? Of course the theorists will tell us that our suggestion is utterly wrong in principle. But the problem of the town and country merchant is not theoretical. It is very practical; and he wants some practical suggestion that will immediately enable him to fight the great aglomerations of capital in the city stores that propose to eliminate him from the equation.

Advertising!

in its highest sense is the creation of a new want and providing the means with which to apply that want. The aim of Advertising is not to spread the name of a firm so much as to get business for that firm. The ad. that counts is the one that makes the luxuries of today the necessities of tomorrow. A great many people advertise as they give to charity—merely to get rid of a solicitor. Then the advertiser says it doesn't pay and when done in that spirit it does not. Advertisers must put brain and selling force into their copy, and when this is done they find that advertising is not an expense, but the finest kind of an investment.

THE HOME PAPER

When the evening shades have fallen
At the ending of the day,
And a fellow rests from labor
Smoking at his pipe of clay:
There is nothing pleases better,
Be his fortune up or down,
Than the little country paper,
From his own home town.

It's not a thing of beauty,
And its print's not always clear,
But it straightens out his temper,
When a fellow's feeling queer;
It takes the wrinkle off his face,
And brushes off the frown,
That little country paper,
From his own home town.

Now I like to read the dailies,
And the story paper, too,
And at times the yellow novel,
And some other trash, don't you?
But when I want some reading,
That will brush away a frown,
I want that little paper
From my own home town.

This ought to impress those who are making gifts from their plenty, and expecting lots of applause.

Saved By a Louse

Sapper Norman Merril, a brother of Mrs. E. J. Skelton, sends home from England, a good story. An officer at the Front was standing in his hut in front of a window. He felt an irritation on his back and, bending over, he placed his hand at the back of his neck and captured an industrious louse. Just as he stooped over an enemy bullet came zipping along passed through the window of the hut, took off the officer's steel helmet and lodged in the hut on the opposite side. Had the officer been standing he would have been killed instantly. So he held the small louse in his hand and said to it: - Dear little louse, you have saved my life; I can't give you a D. S. O. medal, I can't give you a D. C. M. and I can't give you a Victoria Cross but I can give you your liberty by placing you back whence I captured you.

Pretty Pinkerton Wedding

A pretty wedding took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Moffat, Spruce Lawn, Pinkerton, on Wednesday, July 18th. when their daughter, Miss Annie Jane, was united in marriage to Mr. Henry James Brown of Grand Valley. The ceremony was performed by Rev. R. M. Gale, pastor of Pinkerton Presbyterian Church, at six o'clock in the evening, in the presence of a large company of the relatives and immediate friends. The bride, who was prettily gowned in cream satin with an overdress of ninon and bridal veil, carrying a boquet of roses and sweet peas, was given away by her father. Two pretty little twin nieces of the groom, Winnie and Ruby Morden, acted as ribbon bearers. The wedding march was played by Miss Alexia Moffat, sister of the bride. Afterwards a bountiful and dainty supper was served at which about fifty sat down. Many beautiful gifts were received by the popular bride, including a cheque for a hundred dollars from her father. The groom's gift to the bride was a lovely pearl necklace, to the organist, a pearl ring, and to the two ribbon bearers, gold lockets. Mr. and Mrs. Brown left on a trip to Guelph and other points before taking up residence near Grand Valley, where Mr. Brown is farming and where the bride taught school the past year. The best wishes of a wide circle of friends in this district go with the bride to her new home.

A New Stamp

It has been decided to issue a special stamp to celebrate the 50th Anniversary of Confederation. There will not likely be a series, but only a three-cent stamp. The exact design has not yet been settled so that the stamp was not ready for Dominion Day. It will be issued some time this Month.

Heat Works Wonders

The London Advertiser published the following crop report from Walkerton yesterday: - The hot weather is working wonders in the appearance of the crops. Until a few days ago there had been rain almost daily for six weeks and the low lands had begun to show the results. Fall wheat is beginning to turn and while not large will be an average yield. Spring crops with favorable weather for a few weeks, will give bumper returns. Except on low lands corn is recovering from the wet spell. Quite a large number of pieces of alfalfa that were cut the week before last will be of use only as straw. Roots and potatoes are showing up well. Blight has shown a few places on the potatoes, but it is expected the hot weather will check it.

A Day's Fishing in Timagami records a perfectly satisfactory outing by a number of Torontonians on one of the dog days of last summer. Other articles are King of the Stream, Canoe Racing, The Prairie Chicken, The Criminal etc. In addition departments devoted to Guns and Ammunition, The Trap, Fishing, Kennel, etc. are well maintained. KILLED BY TRAIN

Sister of Mrs. Dan Ernest Was the Victim of a Shocking Fatality at Woodstock on Thursday Night.

Mrs. Dan Ernest received the shocking news on Friday that her sister, Mrs. Wm. Baker, who lived near Woodstock, had been instantly killed by a G. T. R. train. It appears that Mrs. Baker who was the wife of a well-known farmer living a mile east of Gobles, accompanied her married daughter, who was returning to Moosejaw, as far as Toronto. Gobles is a flag station and Mrs. Baker had fears of being carried past the station on her way home as had nearly happened on several previous occasions. Remarking to a friend that it was an awful place to get off, she started for the door a few moments before the train slowed down. That was the last seen of her until her mangled remains were found on the track a few minutes later. The shock was a terrible one to her husband who had come to meet her at the station. Mrs. Baker was an active woman of 51 years. She was a member of the Anglican Church and very energetic in patriotic and Red Cross work. Very deep sympathy is felt by all the friends of the family in their distressing bereavement. Mr. and Mrs. Ernest and daughter, Viola, went to Woodstock on Saturday to attend the funeral.

Bert Looks Fine

A letter received from Bert. Runstadtler, who is a prisoner of war in Germany, gives very little information, the enemy censorship being very strict, but a photograph enclosed, showing Bert looking fine, fat and fit, is reassuring evidence for his friends here.

160th for France?

In a letter recently received by Wm. McDonald M. P. P. from his son, Lt. J. C. McDonald he says Col. Sutherland their new commander expects the Bruce Battalion to be in France by Aug. 1st. Col. Sutherland is immensley popular with the officers and privates of his Battalion.

DIED VERY SUDDENLY

Alex Robertson of Saskatoon Was Native of Enniskillen and Brother of Mrs. P. Ritchie of Walkerton.

A telegram received by Mrs. P. Ritchie on Tuesday evening contained the shocking intelligence that her brother, Alex. Robertson, of Saskatoon, had died suddenly. Just the day before Mrs. Ritchie had a long letter from her brother stating "all are well" so that his illness must have been of short duration. At the time Mr. Robertson was on a visit to Zion City, Ill. in company was his wife and daughters. Mr. Robertson lived in Saskatoon district, where he farmed 1400 acres of land. He was a near neighbor of his nephew, the late Edwin Ritchie, who passed away only a few months ago with heart trouble. In his letter received on Monday he referred to his nephew's sudden death, little dreaming no doubt that his own life would be cut short in a few days, and told how he was doing everything in his power to assist his nephew's widow in her business affairs.

Mrs. Robertson was born at Enniskillen, his father being the late Alex. Robertson, a Greenock pioneer. In company with his father he went to the West at the age of 12. That was 45 years ago. Mr. Robertson was a pioneer of his district in Saskatchewan and a most successful farmer. He was a man of sterling christian character, exceedingly kind-hearted and was held in the highest respect in the community Besides his widow, he leaves a family of three sons and four daughters, of whom all but one little girl, are grown up. Mrs. P. Ritchie of Walkerton, Mrs. Leslie of Holland, Man. are sisters, and William Robertson of Grand View, Man., an only surviving brother.

TUESDAY WAS HOTTEST

Humidity Adds to Oppressiveness Although Temperature Was Not A Patch on Last Year's Hot Dry Heat.

Walkerton has been fairly sizzling under the first hot spell of the year. The heat got in its best work around Tuesday noon, when the govt. thermometer at Schmidt's fruit farm showed 94 degrees. Other thermometers down town chased the hundred mark pretty close. Monday showed 92, and Sunday 91. The large amount of humidity in the air, and the fact that people haven't got used to hot weather this year, added to the oppressiveness. Several citizens suffered from heatstrokes. Walkerton people can take comfort from the fact that the present hot spell isn't in it with the roasting weather of last summer. On August 20 last the mercury climbed to 102. The air was drier at that time though. It was the week of the New Ontario forest fires.

The Provincial weather man holds out hopes of more comfortable weather the next few days. He expects the South-west winds which have been supplying the toasting heat, will shift to west and north-west winds from cooler regions. Oh let it be soon!

Expected Home Soon.

Gnr. Jim Leech, a Walkerton soldier, who has been in khaki ever since the War started is expected home from England pretty soon. Mr. Amos Leech, East Ward, had a letter from his brother last week, saying that he expected to return to Canada shortly. A letter from a relative in England received Monday, said that Jim expected to sail any day. Gnr. Leech who is a South African War Veteran, was one of the first men in Walkerton to rush to the colors. He enlisted with the 34th Batt. but was transferred to the 16th Guelph Battery, with which unit he went to France. At the Front Jim seemed to lead a charmed life. Not once was he wounded, but two years in trenches without respite resulted in a bad attack of bronchitis and he has been in the Hospital since January last. He is now being invalided home.

SPEAKING of advertising, here is what some of the publishers charge for space: Ladies Home Journal $8 a line or $104 per inch, and $6,000 for a full page each' issue; the back cover sells for $10,000. A full page advertisement in the Saturday Evening Post sells for $5,000. and the back cover sells for $7,000; the centre page in colors is $12,000. As this advertising space is always filled, it is evident that advertising pays even at these prices.

HOW many has Canada sent Overseas anyway? On January 22nd, the Prime Minister said that 413,279 had enlisted up to that time. In June the Minister of Militia stated that 312,503 of all ranks had crossed the ocean and 25,475 were drilling in Canada. Mr. Truax pointed out in the House of Commons that according to these figures 75,000 who enlisted are missing, not accounted for and suggested that the Government bring down accurate figures, as the people cannot understand the cause of the descrepancy.

HON. THOS. WHITE has gold-bricked the advocates of conscription of wealth. His new income tax, instead of laying hold of war-profits to assist in financing the war, relieves the profiteers of a large portion of the inadequate amount they are at present paying. According to the Finance Minister's philosophy, the man who gives a dollar, is making a greater sacrifice than he who lays down his life. Mr. White balances the Soldier's All against 5 per cent of the capitalist's surplus income.

SPEAKING of those forces in this country which oppose Canada doing her part in the War, the Manitoba Free Press, the leading liberal paper in the West, whose editor, Mr. J. W. Defoe has made a first-hand study of conditions says:—The danger that these forces may control the part that Canada will play for the remainder of the war is very real. It can be met effectively in only one way. Those who take the contrary view of the country's duty must come together and find a way to co operate with one another for the remainder of the war, without capitulation with regard to the views on lesser issues which have divided them in the past and will disunite them in the future when the pressure of these days of war relaxes. It will be the design of those who aim at fixing bounds to Canada's part in the war to set those who take the sterner view at odds over issues of domestic importance. If they succeed in this they will succeed as well in their larger plans; and Canada will dim her glorious record in the war by embarking upon a policy which will betray the living and dishonor the dead.

THE leading liberal editors of Ontario, assembled in Convention at Toronto last week, to discuss the political situation, passed the following resolution:

"1. Canada's task is to organize her man-power and resources for the winning of the war, including compulsory military service, conscription of wealth, progressive income tax, increased food production, control of profiteering, nationalization of munition plants national and personal thrift and economy, etc.

"2. It is essential that our troops be backed up by the needed reinforcements, and that the Liberal party in Ontario should stand squarely for compulsory military service, and that no candidate should be nominated who will not support this.

"3. [illegible] fore necessary.

Hands Across Border

LT.-COL. JOHN S. DENNIS,
Who has been loaned by Lord Shaughnessy as Commanding Officer British Recruiting Mission Western Division, for the recruiting of British and Canadian subjects in the United States. Col Dennis is stationed in Chicago at the present time.

YOU wouldn't exactly call it hands across the sea because Canada is only across a lake; but Canada is part of England, which is a long way from South State Street. Anyway, what I'm driving at is this:

Lieutenant Colonel J. S. Dennis, officer commanding the western division of the British Recruiting Mission, recently clasped hands with Captain F. R. Kenney, officer commanding the recruiting district of Northern Illinois for the United States army.

When two belligerent parties shake hands there are only two things which the referee or third party can say—either "Take your corners" or "Bless you, my children."

I said neither. But I held my breath, for it was an impressive moment, the formal enactment in Chicago of immortal history; the physical union of the fighting strength of two great nations. And the spirit of patriotic co-operation in the common cause of justice sanctified the alliance.

Colonel Dennis and Captain Kenney joined in plans. What they want is men to send to the front. Neither has any choice as to whether the men go in Canadian kilts or American khakis.

At every one of the dozens of scattered stations under Captain Kenney's command volunteers of Canadian citizenship are being taken for the expeditionary forces of the Dominion; at every headquarters over which Colonel Dennis has control volunteers of American allegiance are being taken for our own National Army.

Captain Kenney is credited with being a bit of a bearcat on the science of recruiting. But he was immensely impressed with the policies and ideas expressed by the distinguished Canadian man of war.

The solid week of British rallying here will show some fireworks illustrative of the spirit that created and immortalized Canada's first [illegible]. A kiltie band will whoop it up; there will be mass meetings and boundary oratory and thousands of direct appeals by mail and an advertising and newspaper campaign with no limits determined.

Colonel Dennis says that there are 157,000 Canadians in Chicago. Calgary, with a total population of 60,000, sent 15,000 soldiers to the front. What then might Chicago yield. There are about 350,000 British subjects here, and some sixty-five St. George and Maple Leaf societies. There is no shortage of material hereabout for the British recruiting mission.

A thrillingly interesting man is Colonel Dennis. He is the most versatile individual I have ever met. If one were suddenly to inquire in Ottawa, "Who is Dennis?" one might get back the typically British answer, "Who is he not?"

For years he was assistant to the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, Lord Shaughnessy. He has fought Indians, is a veteran with honors of the South African expedition, has engineered road building where Indians had to be killed as regularly as ties had to be laid in the progress; but he is more—he is a dilettante journalist, a devotee of art, a snappy after dinner talker, an occasional enthusiastic Broadwayite, a raconteur of modest but fascinating personality. Robust and mighty of stature, he rings with military melody all over. The colonel is making headquarters in the Marquette building and his residence at the [illegible] stone. Welcome to our city!—By Jack Lait.

THE Simcoe Reformer, which was the first newspaper in Canada to suggest a coalition government and one of the first liberal newspapers to urge conscription, very pointedly places the blame for the present situation where it belongs. Editor Lewis says:—"It is always and ever to be remembered that it is Robert Borden, not Wilfrid Laurier, who has been Premier of Canada for the past three years. It was R. L. Borden who might have said, three or two years ago, "Let us have coalition." And no man in Canada dared have said him nay. Men of little vision, he and his colleagues thought the task of directing Canada's share in the world war, was well within their partizan limitations. And the war won—a grateful country would reward them by the bestowal of the liberty to do as they pleased with their own. A Coalition Government would have avoided many awful quagmires into which the country under vaccilating partizan leadership has been led. Robert Borden declined to say the word until he and his Government were in extremis. And when it said it, it was in such a tone and under such circumstances as to invite rejection." And again: "Nothing but the dire straits into which the Allied cause has been cast by the Russian debacle warrants any Liberal extending a tittle of sympathy to the Government that, under the domination of Bob Rogers, has used Liberalism infamously, and from first to last played its own concerns first and the nation's second in every situation that has risen."

A MESSAGE FROM THE RED CROSS

Mrs. Belmont Tiffany has written for the August issue of Harper's Bazar a very interesting article on "A message from the American Red Cross to the Women of America." She especially mentions the part that women of society are taking in this great work, and also tells of the organization's rapid growth since the war began in 1914.

Mrs. Tiffany explains very clearly the different functions of the Red Cross, for instance, this is what she says about the Department of Civilian Relief:—"Perhaps it is not generally known by persons not familiar with the work that the Red Cross has a Department of Civilian Relief, with which the Department of Military Relief coordinates and cooperates. In other words, [illegible] comes to puttin' up a show. Now, Kitty, don't you try to drive a plug in your dad's sentiments again. Mrs. Crandall's all right—one of us." A shocked look from his daughter. "Oh, there I go again, forgettin'. Lady Crandall, I mean. Excuse me, ma'am."

"Don't you dare apologize," the governor's wife playfully threatened Mr. Sherman with her whip. "I love the sound of good, old fashioned 'Mrs.' Just imagine—married five years and nobody has called me 'Mrs. Crandall' until you did just now! 'Wedded, but Not a Mrs.' Wouldn't that be a perfectly gorgeous title for a Laura Jean novel? Miss Gerson, let's hop out and join these home folks. They're my kind."

The burst of laughter that greeted Lady Crandall's sally was not over before she had leaped nimbly from her high perch, Henry J. gallantly assisting. Jane followed, and the coachman from his little bob seat in the back drove the dog cart over the road to wait his mistress' pleasure. The scattered blocks of olive gray on the field had coalesced into a solid regiment now, and the long, double rank of men was sweeping forward like the cutting arm of a giant mower. The party of Americans joined the sparse crowd of spectators at the edge of the field, the better to see. Jane Gerson found herself chatting with Willy Kimball and Kitty Sherman a little apart from the others. A light touch fell on her elbow. She turned to find Almer, the hotel keeper, smiling deferentially.

"Pardon—a thousand pardons for the intrusion, lady. I am Almer of the Hotel Splendide."

"You haven't remembered something more I owe you?" Jane challenged brusquely.

"Oh, no, lady!" Almer spread out his hands. "I happened to see you here watching the parade, and I remembered a trivial duty I have which, if I may be so bold as to ask, you may discharge much more quickly than I—if you will."

"I discharge a duty—for you?" The girl did not conceal her puzzlement. Almer's hand fumbled in a pocket of his flapping alpaca coat and produced a plain silver cigarette case, unmonogrammed. She looked at it wonderingly.

"Captain Woodhouse—you met him at my hotel last night, lady. He left this lying on his dresser when he quit his room to go to barracks today. For me it is difficult to send a messenger with it to the barracks—wartime, lady—many restrictions inside the lines. I came here hoping perhaps to see the captain after the parade. But you"—

"You wish me to give this to Captain Woodhouse?" Jane finished, a flicker of annoyance crossing her face. "Why me?"

"You are at government house, lady. Captain Woodhouse comes to tea—all newcomers to the garrison do that. If you would be so good"—

Jane took the cigarette case from Almer's outstretched hand. Lady Crandall had told her the captain would be in for tea that afternoon. It was a small matter, this accommodation, as long as Almer did not insinuate—as he had not done—any impertinence; imply any overeagerness on her part to perform so minor a service for the officer. Almer bowed his thanks and lost himself in the crowd. Jane turned again to where Kitty and Kimball were chatting.

"A dun for extra service the landlord forgot last night, I'll wager," the youth greeted her.

"Oh, no, just a little present," Jane laughed back at him, holding up the silver case. "With Almer's compliments to Captain Woodhouse, who forgot it when he gave up his room today. I've promised to turn it over to the captain and save the hotel man a lot of trouble and red tape getting a messenger through to the captain's quarters."

"By Jove!" Kimball's tired eyes lighted up with a quick flash of smoker's yearning. "A life saver! Came away from my room without my pet Egyptians—Mr. Sherman yelling at me to hurry or we'd miss this slow show and all that. I'm going to play the panhandler and beg one of your captain friend's smokes. He must be a good sort or you wouldn't be doing little favors for him, Miss Gerson. Come, now; in your capacity as temporary executrix will you invest one of the captain's cigarettes in a demand of real charity?"

Keen desire was scarcely veiled under Kimball's fiction of light patter. Smilingly the girl extended the case to him.

"Just to make it businesslike, the executrix demands your note for—um—sixty days, say. 'For one cigarette received I promise to pay'"—

"Given!" He pulled a gold pencil from his pocket and made a pretense of writing the form on his cuff. Then he lit his borrowed cigarette and inhaled it gratefully.

"Your captain friend's straight from Egypt; I don't have to be told that," Willy Kimball murmured in polite ecstasy. "At Shepard's, in Cairo, you'll get such a cigarette as this and nowhere else in a barren world. The breath of the acanthus blossom—if it really has a breath—never heard."

"Back in Kewanee the Ladies' Aid society will have you arrested," Kitty put in mischievously. "They're terribly wrought up over cigarettes—for minors."

Kimball cast her a glance of deep reproach. As he lifted the cigarette to his lip for a second puff Jane's eyes mechanically followed the movement. Something caught and held them, wonder filled.

On the side of the white paper cylinder nearest her a curious brown streak appeared. By the merest freak of chance her glance fell on it. As she looked the thin stain grew darker nearest the fresh ash. The farther end of the faint tracing moved—yes, moved like a threadworm groping its way along a stick.

"Now, what are they all doing out there," Kitty Sherman was asking—"all those men running top speed with their guns carried up so high?"

"Bayonet charge," Kimball answered. "Nothing like the real thing, of course."

Jane Gerson was watching the twisting and writhing of that filament of brown against the white. An invisible hand was writing in brown ink on the side of the cigarette—writing backward and away from the burning tip. Letters of silver nitrate formed themselves under her eyes. Kimball took the cigarette from his lips and held it by his side for a minute. He and Kitty were busy with each other's company, for the time ignoring Jane. She burned with curiosity and with excitement mounting like the fire of wine to her brain. Would he never put that cigarette to his lips again, so she could follow the invisible pen? So fleeting, so evanescent, that worm track on the paper, wrought by fire and by fire to be consumed! A mystery vanishing even as it was aborning! After ages the unconscious Kimball set the cigarette again in his lips.

—nformer has denounced you to Crandall—play your game and he will be slow to—

Again the cigarette came away in Kimball's hand. Acting on impulse she did not stop to question, Jane struck it from the young man's outstretched hand and set her foot on it as it fell in the dust.

"Oh, I'm clumsy!" She fell lightly against Kimball's shoulder and caught herself in well simulated confusion. "Standing tiptoe to see what that man on a horse is going to do, lost my balance. And—and your precious cigarette—gone!"

The anguish in Jane Gerson's voice was not play. It was real—terribly real.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Captain Comes to Tea.

JANE GERSON, alone for the first time since the incident of the cigarette on the parade ground a few hours back, sat before a narrow window in her room at Government House fighting a great bewilderment.

Could there now be any doubt of what she felt to be the truth? First, she had met Captain Woodhouse on the Express du Nord—an officer in the English army, by his own statement, returning from leave in England to his post in Egypt. Then the encounter of last night at the Hotel Splendide, Captain Woodhouse first denying his identity, then admitting it under the enforced pledge that she should not reveal the former meeting. Captain Woodhouse, not in Egypt, but at Gibraltar, and, as she had soon learned, there with papers of transfer from an Egyptian post to the garrison of the Rock. Following this surprise had come General Crandall's dogged examination of that morning—his blunt declaration that a serious question as to the captain's position at Gibraltar had arisen and his equally plain spoken threat to have the truth from her concerning her knowledge of the suspected officer.

To cap all, the message on the cigarette! An informer—she guessed the prefix to the unfinished word—had denounced "you" to General Crandall. To whom the pronoun referred was unmistakable—Almer's eagerness to insure Captain Woodhouse's receiving the cigarette case plainly defined that. A hotel keeper warns an officer in the Gibraltar garrison that he has been denounced, but in the same message adjures him to "play your own game." That was the single compelling fact.

Jane Gerson flushed—in anger, or was it through guilt?—when she found her lips framing the word "spy!"

Now she understood why General Crandall had put her on the grill—why he, informed, had leaped to the significance of the gift of roses and deduced her previous acquaintance with their donor. Her host was not, after all, the possessor of magical powers of mind reading. He was, instead, just the sober, conscientious protector of the Rock on whom rested responsibility for the lives of its defenders and the maintenance of England's flag there. His duty was to catch—and shoot—spies.

Shoot spies! The girl's heart contracted at the thought. No, no! She would not, she could not, reveal to the governor the knowledge she had. That would be to send death to a man as surely as if hers was the finger at the trigger.

Jane Gerson was on her feet now, pacing the room. Over and over again she told herself that this man who had come into her life, obliquely enough, had no claim on her, had brought nothing to her but distress. He had deceived her even and then, when caught in the deception, had wrested from her a promise that she would help him continue further deception against others. Against her will he had made her a party to some deep and audacious plot whose purpose she could not guess, but which must be but a part of the huge mystery of war.

And soon this Captain Woodhouse was to come to his trial. The purpose of his invitation to tea that afternoon flashed clear as white light. Soon she would be in the same room with him, would be forced to witness the spinning of the web set to trap him. He would come unwarned, unsuspecting. He might leave that room under guard and with guns at his back—guns soon to be leveled at his heart. Yet she, Jane Gerson, possessed the power to save him, as the warning of the cigarette surely would be saving, once a clever man were put on his guard by it.

Would she speak—and betray General Crandall, her kindly host? Would she lock her lips and see a man walk blindfolded to his death?

A few minutes before 5 o'clock Major Bishop was announced at Government House and received by General Crandall in the library. Before Jaimihr Khan, who had preceded the visitor through the double doors from the hall, could retire his master stopped him.

"I have a little commission for you, Jaimihr."

"One minute, Jaimihr! Have a seat, Bishop. Glad you've come a bit early. Come here, Jaimihr."

The tall, reedlike figure of the Indian glided to General Crandall's side. His thin ascetic features were set in their usual mold of unseeing detachment. Only his dark eyes showed animation.

"Yes, my general," he said as he stopped before the Englishman.

"I have a little commission for you, Jaimihr," General Crandall began, weighing his words with care. "The utmost discretion. You understand?"

"The utmost. I understand." Jaimihr Khan's lips moved ever so slightly, and his eyes looked steadily ahead.

"In the course of a few minutes Captain Woodhouse of the signal service will be here to tea," the general began. The Indian repeated mechanically, "Cap-tain Wood-house."

"As soon as you have ushered him into this room you will go as quickly as you can to the west barracks. His room will be No. 30, on the second gallery. You will enter his room with a key I shall give you and search it from end to end—everything in it. Anything that is of a suspicious nature—you understand, Jaimihr, what that might be—you will bring here to me at once."

"It shall be done, General Sahib."

"No one, officer or man, must suspect your errand. No one must see you enter or leave that room."

"No one," the Indian repeated.

General Crandall went to a wall safe set by the side of the double doors, turned the combination and opened it. He took from a drawer therein a bunch of keys, selected one and passed it to Jaimihr Khan.

"The utmost care, remember!" he warned again.

"Is it likely I should fail you this time, General Sahib, when so many times I have succeeded?"

"Make the search complete." General Crandall ignored his servant's question. "But return as quickly as you can. I shall keep Captain Woodhouse here until you do so. You must report to me before he leaves this house."

"When the moment arrives your servant shall fly, General Sahib," the Indian replied, and withdrew.

"I say, general, you have a great deal of faith in your Indian," Bishop ventured, accepting a cigarette from his superior's case. "Rather a delicate commission you've given him."

"Absolute faith, yes. Been with me five years—picked him up in Rangoon—have tried him many times and found him as loyal as any officer in the service." General Crandall put in his words enough emphasis to carry slight rebuke for the other's implied criticism. But the pursy little major was too sure of the fine terms of personal friendship between himself and his superior to feel embarrassment. "Now, as to our plan for Woodhouse's reception—this affair of Craigen's wife; we might as well agree on points, so that"— He heard his wife's voice in the room off the library and broke off abruptly. "Confound it! The women are coming! Just step into my room with me and we'll go over this little matter, major."

General Crandall held open a small door at the left of his desk and followed Bishop through. Lady Crandall and Jane entered the library almost at the same time.

"This tea of George's is preposterous," the lady of Government House was grumbling. "Said we must have this man from Egypt here at once."

"If you were English no tea could be preposterous," Jane countered, with a brave attempt at lightness. She felt each passing moment a weight adding to the suspense of the inevitable event.

"Well, I'm going to get it through with just as soon as I can," Lady Crandall snapped. Then Jaimihr Khan threw open the double doors and announced, "Captain Woodhouse, my lady."

"Show him up," she commanded. Then in complaint to Jane: "Now, where do you suppose that husband of mine went? Just like him to suggest a tea and forget to make an appearance."

Captain Woodhouse appeared between the opened doors in khaki and trim puttees. He stood very straight for an instant, his eyes shooting rapidly about the room. Lady Crandall hurried forward to greet him, and his momentary stiffness disappeared. The girl behind her followed slowly, almost reluctantly. Woodhouse grasped her extended hand.

"It was good of you to send the flowers," she murmured. The man smiled appreciation.

"Do you know," he said, "after I sent them I thought you'd consider me a bit—prompt."

"I am learning something every day—about Englishmen," Jane managed to answer, with a ghost of a smile.

Lady Crandall, who had been vainly ringing for Jaimihr Khan, excused herself on the necessity of looking after the tea things.

"I fancy you New Yorkers suffer most from newness—newness right out of the shop," Jane heard the captain saying. "But the old things are the best. Imagine the monks of a long ago yesterday toasting themselves before this ancient fireplace." He waved toward the massive Gothic mantel bridging a cavernous fireplace. An old chime bell, green with weathering, hung on a low frame beside the firedogs.

"You're mistaken; that's manufactured antiquity," Jane caught him up. "Lady Crandall told me last night that fireplace is just five years old. One of the preceding governor's hobbies it was."

Woodhouse caught at her answer with a quick lifting of the brows. He turned again to feast his eyes on the girl's piquant face, even more alluring now because of the fleeting color that left the cheeks with a tea rose's coldness.

"Miss Gerson, something I have done or said"—the man was laboring after words—"you are not yourself, and maybe I am respon"—

She turned from him with a slight shudder. Her hand was extended in mute appeal for silence. He waited while his eyes followed the heaving of her shoulders under the emotion that was racking her. Suddenly she faced him again, and words rushed from her lips in an abandon of terror:

"Captain Woodhouse, I know too much—about you and why you are here. Oh, more than I want to! Accident—bad luck, believe me, it is not my seeking that I know you are a—a"—

He had started forward at her outburst, and now he stood very close to her, his gray eyes cold and unchanging.

"Say it—say the word! I'm not afraid to hear it," he commanded tensely. She drew back from him a little wildly, her hands fluttering up, as if to fend him off.

"You—you are in great danger this minute. You were brought here this afternoon to be trapped—exposed and made"—

"It is not my seeking that I know you are a—a"—

"I was fully aware of that when I came, Miss Gerson," he interrupted. "The invitation, coming so suddenly—so pressing—I think I read it aright."

"But the promise you made me give last night!" Sudden resentment brushed aside for the instant the girl's first flood of sympathy. "That has involved me with you. Oh, that was unfair—to make me promise I would not allude to—to our first meeting!"

"Involved you?" He closed one of her hands in his as if to calm her and force more rational speech. "Then you have been"—

"Questioned by General Crandall—about you," she broke in, struggling slightly to free her hand. "Questioned—and even bullied and threatened."

"And you kept your promise?" The question was put so low Jane could hardly catch it. She slowly nodded.

"Miss Gerson, you will never have cause to regret that you did." Woodhouse pressed her hand with almost fierce intenseness, then let it go. His face was flaming now under the stress of excitement. She knew tears stood in her eyes and was angered at their being there. He might mistake them. Woodhouse continued in the same suppressed tone:

"You were on the point of using a word a minute ago, Miss Gerson, which was hard for you to voice because you thought it an ugly word. You seemed sure it was the right word to fit me. You only hesitated out of—ah—decency. Yet you kept faith with me before General Crandall. May I hope that means"—

"You may hope nothing!" Quick rebellion at what she divined to be coming flamed in Jane's eyes. "You have no right to hope for more from me than what you forced by promise. I would not be saying what I have to you if—if I did not feel I—that your life"—

"You misunderstood," he broke in stiffly. "I was on the point of saying I hoped you would not always believe me a"—

"Not believe!" Her hand went to the broad ribbon belt she wore and brought out the silver cigarette case. This she passed to him with a swift gesture.

"Almer, the Hotel Splendide man, gave me this today at parade, urging that I deliver it to you." She was speaking hurriedly. "By a miracle—the strangest circumstance in the world—I learned the message this cigarette case was to carry to you. Oh, no; innocently enough on my part—it came by a chance I must not take the time to explain."

"A message from—Almer to me?" Woodhouse could not conceal the start her words gave him. He took a step toward her eagerly.

"Yes, a message. You must have it to protect yourself. The message was this:

Informer has denounced you to—

Her voice died in her throat. Over Captain Woodhouse's shoulder she saw a door open. General Crandall and a short fat man in officer's uniform entered the library.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Third Degree.

"GOOD afternoon, Captain Woodhouse." General Crandall came forward and shook the captain's hand cordially. "Miss Gerson, Major Bishop of my staff."

Jane acknowledged the introduction. Major Bishop advanced to the meeting with Woodhouse expectantly. With an air of ill assumed ease, the governor made them known to each other.

"Major Bishop, your new man in the signal tower, Captain Woodhouse, from Wady Halfa. Captain, do you happen to remember the major? Was a captain when you were here on the Rock—captain in the engineers."

"I'm afraid we never met," Woodhouse began easily. "I was here such a short time. Expected to meet Major Bishop when I reported at his office this morning, but he was over at the wireless station, his aid told me."

"Right, captain!" Bishop chirped, shaking his subordinate's hand. "I—ah—imagine this is the first time we've met." He put the least shade of emphasis on the verb.

Woodhouse met his eyes boldly. Lady Crandall, bustling in at this minute, directed a maid where to wheel the tea wagon, while Jane went to assist her with the pouring. The men soon had their cups, and the general and major contrived to group themselves with Woodhouse sitting between them. Sir George, affecting a gruff geniality, launched a question:

"Rock look familiar to you, Captain?"

"After a fashion, yes," Woodhouse answered slowly. "Though three months is so short a time for one to get a lasting impression."

"Nonsense!" the general reproved gustily. "Some places you see once you never forget. This old Rock is one of the them, eh, Bishop?"

"I don't know," the chunky little officer replied. "The powers back home never give me a chance to get away and forget." There was a pause as the men sipped their tea. Woodhouse broke the silence:

"Man can be stationed in worse places than Gibraltar."

"Let me see, Captain Woodhouse"—it was little Bishop who took up the probe—"you must have been here in the days when Craigen was governor—saw your papers have it that you were here three months in nineteen seven."

"Yes, Craigen was governor then," Woodhouse answered guardedly.

"You never saw him, general." Bishop turned to Sir George. "Big, bluff, blustering chap, with a voice like the bull of Bashan. Woodhouse, here, he'll recognize my portrait."

Woodhouse smiled—secret disdain for the clumsy trap was in that smile.

"I'm afraid I do not," he said. "Craigen was considered a small, almost a delicate man." He had recognized the bungling emphasis laid by Bishop on Craigen's characteristics, and his answer was pretty safely drawn by choosing the opposites. Bishop looked flustered for an instant, then admitted Woodhouse was right. He had confused Sir David Craigen with his predecessor, he said in excuse.

"I fancy I ought to remember the man. I had tea in this very room with him several times," Woodhouse ventured. He let his eyes rove as if in reminiscence. "Much the same here—as—except, General Crandall, I don't recall that fireplace." He indicated the heavy gothic ornament on the opposite side of the room.

Jane caught her breath under the surge of secret elation. The resource of the man so to turn to advantage a fact that she had carelessly given him in their conversation of a few minutes back! The girl saw a flicker of surprise cross General Crandall's face. Lady Crandall broke in:

"You have a good memory after all, Captain Woodhouse. That fireplace is just five years old."

"Um—yes, yes," her husband admitted. "Clever piece of work, though. Likely to deceive anybody by its show of antiquity."

General Crandall called for a second slice of lemon in his cup. He was obviously sparring for another opening, but was impressed by the showing the suspected man was making. Bishop pushed the inquisition another step.

"Did you happen to be present, captain, at the farewell dinner we gave little Billy Barnes? I think it must have been in the spring you were here."

"There were many dinners, Major Bishop." Woodhouse was carefully selecting his words, and he broke his sentences with a sip from his cup. "Seven years is a long time, you know. We had much else to think about in Egypt than old dinners elsewhere."

Bishop appeared struck by an inspiration. He clapped his cup into its saucer with a sudden bang.

"Hang it, man, you must have been here in the days of Lady Evelyn. Remember her, don't you?"

"Would I be likely to forget?" the captain parried. Out of the tail of his eye he had a flash of Jane Gerson's white face, of her eyes seeking his with a palpitant, hunted look. The message of her eyes brought to him an instant of grace in sore trial.

General Crandall rose to set his cup on the tea wagon. With the most casual air in the world, he addressed himself to Woodhouse:

"When Sir David died many of his effects were left in this house to await their proper owner's disposition, and Lady Craigen has been—er—delicate about claiming them. Among them was the portrait of Lady Craigen herself, which still hangs in this room. Have you recognized it, captain?"

Woodhouse, whose mind had been leaping forward vainly trying to divine the object of the Lady Evelyn lead, now knew, and the knowledge left him beyond his resources. He recognized the moment of his unmasking. But the man's nerve was steady even in extremity. He rose and turned to face the rear wall of the library, against the tapestry of which hung four oil portraits in their deep old frames of heavy gold. Three of these were of women. A fourth, also the likeness of a woman, hung over the fireplace. Chances were 4 to 1 against blind choice.

As Woodhouse slowly lifted his eyes to the line of portraits he noticed that Jane had moved to place the broad tent shade of a floor lamp on its tall standard of mahogany between herself and the other two men so that her face was momentarily screened from them. She looked quickly at the portrait over the mantel and away again. Woodhouse, knowing himself the object of two pairs of hostile eyes, made his survey deliberately, with purpose increasing the tension of the moment. His eyes ranged the line of portraits on the rear wall, then turned to that one over the fireplace.

"Ah, yes; a rather good likeness, eh, major?" He drawled his identification with a disinterested air.

Crandall's manner underwent instant change. His former slightly strained punctiliousness gave way to naturalness and easy spirits. One would have said he was advocate for a man on trial for whom the jury had just pronounced, "Not proved." Scotch verdict, yes, but one acceptable enough to the governor of Gibraltar. The desk telephone sounded just then, and General Crandall answered. After listening briefly he gave the orders, "Dress flags!" and hung up the receiver.

"'Fleet's just entering the harbor,' signal tower reports," he explained to the others. "Miss Gerson, if you care to step here to the window you'll see something quite worth while."

Jane, light hearted almost to the point of mild hysteria at the noticeable relaxation of strain denoting danger passed, bounded to a double French window giving on a balcony and commanding a view of all the bay to the Spanish shore. She exclaimed in awe:

"Ships, ships! Hundreds of them!"

"Ships, ships! Hundreds of them! Why, general, what"—

"The Mediterranean fleet, young woman, bound home to protect the channel against the German high seas fleet." Deep pride was in the governor's voice. His eyes kindled as they fell on the distant pillars of smoke, scores of them, mounting straight up to support the blue on their blended arches. Captain Woodhouse could scarcely conceal the start General Crandall's announcement gave him. He followed the others to the window more slowly.

Jane was out on the balcony now with field glasses she picked up from the governor's desk. She called back through the curtains, summoning Woodhouse to come and pick out for her the flagship. When he had joined her Bishop stepped quickly to his superior's side.

"What do you think, general? That strikes me as genuine—that portrait of

AUTOINTOXICATION OR SELF-POISONING

The Dangerous Condition Which Produces Many Well Known Diseases.

HOW TO GUARD AGAINST THIS TROUBLE

"FRUIT-A-TIVES" — The Wonderful Fruit Medicine — will Protect You

Autointoxication means self-poisoning, caused by continuous or partial constipation, or insufficient action of the bowels.

Instead of the refuse matter passing daily from the body, it is absorbed by the blood. As a result, the Kidneys and Skin are overworked, in their efforts to rid the blood of this poisoning.

Poisoning of the blood in this way often causes Indigestion, Loss of Appetite and Disturbed Stomach. It may produce Headaches and Sleeplessness. It may irritate the Kidneys and bring on Pain in the Back, Rheumatism, Gout, and Rheumatic Pains. It is the chief cause of Eczema—and keeps the whole system unhealthy by the constant absorption into the blood of this refuse matter.

"Fruit-a-tives" will always cure Autointoxication or self-poisoning—as "Fruit-a-tives" acts gently on bowels, kidneys and skin, strengthens the bowels and tones up the nervous system.

A PIONEER MERCHANT

Well known Former Walkerton Citizen, Mr. Frank Guggisberg, Passes Away at Hamilton on Friday.

On Friday in the city of Hamilton, a former Walkerton citizen in the person of Mr. Frank Guggisberg passed away to his last long home. Mr. Guggisburg was one of Walkerton's pioneer merchants, conducting a grocery business in the block west of Klempp's Hotel for over thirty years. He was highly respected in community and widely known throughout the surrounding district. Thirteen years ago he retired to the city of Hamilton where he resided up to the time of his death. Mr. Guggisberg was an active member of the Methodist Church, and since his removal to the city a member of Wesley Church, Hamilton. Although failing in health recently he was confined to his bed for only five days. Mr. Guggisberg leaves to mourn his loss his wife, two daughters, Miss Clara at home, Mrs. Hess of Hamilton and one son Walter, a barrister of Regina, Sask. The remains were buried at the Hamilton cemetery on Tuesday afternoon last.

Soldiers' Letters

Readers in receipt of letters from the front are invited to make use of The Telescope's columns to give friends the latest tidings from the boys overseas. Every soldier has scores of acquaintances interested in his welfare and anxious for news of his life in the firing line, and publication of the letters in The Telescope is the easiest means of reaching these friends. Care will be taken to avoid publication of any information coming under the ban of the censorship, and the original letters will be carefully preserved and returned.

Baffles Description

In a letter to his mother, Mrs. George Gould, her son, William, who is with a Western Battalion at the Front, tells something of the desolation that the Germans left behind them in their retreat. In a city near where he was quartered, not one house, large or small, was left. Many French women and children were carried off by the retreating army and those inhabitants who have returned to their homes, are sleeping in dugouts, cellars and tents. The scenes of destruction baffle description. I wonder that no guardian angel sprinkled the lintels of the doors, he writes. A day of regret is coming for the enemy. Mr. Gould says that a spring creek ran by the dugout where he was quartered at time of writing. There were some nice brook trout but he could get no hooks or lines as all the shops had been blown to pieces by shell fire. Sitting in front of this dugout after tea he saw two British planes bring down two German machines. He states that his health is first class, could not be better. The French roses were out in bloom. The country round about was lovely, he liked it better than England.

KINGSTON AND BELVILLE

Interesting Sketch of His Trip to Two Beautiful Eastern Ont. Cities by Our Good Friend, Ex-Mayor R. H. McKay

We publish below an interesting account, by our good friend Ex-Mayor R. H. McKay, of the enjoyable trip which he took recently to the cities of Belleville and Kingston.

Editor Telescope,
Walkerton, Ont.

Dear Sir;—

As you announced in your very valuable paper that his Worship the Mayor, Bro. Robinson and myself had left for Belleville to attend the Grand Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, I now write you a few lines which may be of interest to the Brethren and others as well. On arriving in Belleville his Worship the Mayor and Bro. Robinson were quartered at the Quinte Hotel, said to be the finest hotel between Kingston and the Upper Lakes while I was taken to my son-in-law's home. Mr. Lumsden, who holds a very responsible position as one of the Superintendents of the Bell System between Toronto and Kingston, so you will notice that we were amply provided for during our stay in the Beautiful city of Belleville. Next day as many as desired to go were taken in autos marshalled by his Worship Mayor Ketcheson of Belleville to a summer resort on the Bay of Quinte by the name of Welland where a fish dinner so called was served at the Hotel in good style. Leaving Welland we arrived in Belleville to be again entertained by Lieut.-Col. S. S. Lazier and his good lady, at their beautiful residence, Victoria Avenue, where all the delicacies that a Mason's heart could wish for were served. The following two days were occupied by Grand Lodge business, reading reports, electing officers and installing them for the ensuing year when the Brethren took their departure to their homes. About 1200 was in attendance. This order of business being finished my friends took me on a trip to Deseronto and Mohawk Camps, where the brightest of our young men are in training as Aviators to take their place at the Front in defence of what the War stands for. While there, it was a pleasure to see so many of the aeroplanes soaring in the sky. From Deseronto we went to Kingston City, saw Mr. Day, once a High School Teacher in Walkerton now a leading lawyer with an immense business in the city of Kingston. Continuing our trip we were taken through the City Hall and shown fifty portraits of the Mayors of Kingston, beautifully painted and framed, the cheapest costing $500.00 and some $1000.00 each. At the end of the Hall stood the portrait of Sir John A. McDonald, Canada's greatest statesman in full size, painted when thirty five years of age, a beautiful work of the artist. Looking at those beautiful portraits I felt proud at being an Ex-Mayor of my own native town, Walkerton. We then drove round the city to see the great public buildings, the stately mansions of homes, the great statesman, Sir John A. McDonald's monument with the inscription on it in plain letters: "A British Subject I was born and a British Subject I will die"—Sir John A. McDonald.

Dear Sir,—when I saw the great Colleges and magnificent provision in the City of Belleville and Kingston for the education of our young manhood and maidenhood of our Dominion, for the realities of life work and again when I saw the provision that is being made for those whom Providence has not smiled on as others being deaf blind and maimed in many ways, I came home rejoicing to think and repeat to myself the loyal and patriotic words of the great statesman:—"A British Subject I was born and a British Subject I will die."

Yours truly

R. H. McKay Ex-Mayor and Secretary of Saugeen Lodge No. 197.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson VI.—Third Quarter, For Aug. 5, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson. II Chron. xxxiii, 1-20—Memory Verses, 12, 13—Golden Text, Isa. lv, 7—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

There are so many things in the affairs of this world which we cannot understand that we can only find rest in remembering that the Lord liveth, and He is not discouraged, and He shall finally subdue all things unto Himself. It therefore becomes us to rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him (Isa. xlii, 4; Rev. xvii, 14; Ps. xxxvii, 7; Phil. iii, 10, 21). That Ahaz should be such a wicked king, Hezekiah, his son, such a good king and Manasseh, his son, such a monstrosity of iniquity is surely a strange sequence of events, which I certainly do not profess to begin to understand, but I rest in Him who foresees and overrules all things. There is something worthy of prayerful consideration in the fact that Hezekiah had fifteen years added to his life after his serious illness (Isa. xxxviii, 5), but did not render to God for this extension of time as he should have done (II Chron. xxxii, 25).

Manasseh must have been born about three years after that illness, as he was twelve years old when he began reign (xxxiii, 1), and the question presents itself, Was it a real blessing to Hezekiah to have his life thus prolonged? When we are determined to have our own way God sometimes indulges us, even though He knows it is not the best thing for us, as when He gave Israel their request, but sent leanness into their soul (Ps. cix, 15). A mother once told me that when her two boys were very young they were sick unto death, but she would not give them up, and God let them live. But they grew up to give her a broken heart. Whole hearted submission to the perfect will of God is the better way. Contrast the Lord Jesus at the age of twelve about His Father's business and returning to the lowly home at Nazareth, there to be subject to Mary for the next eighteen years (Luke ii, 42-52).

Manasseh's reign was the longest of any of the kings of Judah, fifty-five years, and part of it was the very worst, according to the record in lesson verses 3-10. He wrought much evil in the sight of the Lord and caused Judah and Jerusalem to err and to do worse than the heathen whom the Lord had destroyed before the children of Israel, and, though the Lord spake to him and to his people, they would not hearken (verses 2, 6, 9, 10). He was surely controlled by the devil during that part of his reign.

The Lord permitted the kings of Assyria to take him and bind him and carry him to Babylon, and there in his affliction he humbled himself greatly before God and prayed unto Him, and God heard him and brought him again to Jerusalem and to his kingdom. Then he knew that Jehovah was God (verses 11-13). In the Apocrypha there is a prayer recorded as his, part of which is: "Thou, O Lord, according to Thy great goodness, hast promised repentance and forgiveness to them that have sinned against Thee. * * * I have sinned above the number of the sands of the sea; * * * I have set up abominations and have multiplied offenses. O Lord, I have sinned, and I acknowledge mine iniquities, wherefore, I humbly beseech Thee, forgive me, O Lord, forgive me, and destroy me not with mine iniquities."

Whatever his actual prayer was, God, who reads the heart, saw that he was sincere and abundantly pardoned him, according to Isa. lv, 7. Whatever encouragement there is in this and in the conversion of Saul of Tarsus and of the penitent thief for any and every sinner, however great, to turn to the Lord, for He came to save sinners, and His word ever stands, "Him that cometh to me I will in nowise cast out" (John vi, 37). He is not willing that any should perish and has no pleasure in the death of the wicked (II Pet. iii, 9; Ezek. xxxiii, 11). His cry to sinners is, Look unto me and be saved; incline your ear and come unto me, hear and your soul shall live. And to His own who have wandered He cries: O that they were wise, that they would consider their latter end! O that my people had hearkened unto me and Israel had walked in my ways! (Isa. xlv, 22; lv, 3; Deut. xxxii, 29; Ps. lxxxi, 13). When restored to Jerusalem and to his kingdom he endeavored to right some of the wrongs he had done and to bring forth fruits meet for repentance. He offered peace offerings and thank offerings unto the Lord and commanded Judah to serve the Lord God of Israel (verses 14-17).

Such a change in such a man must have impressed many and turned many to the Lord, but we shall see as we go on in our lessons that the turning of the people away from God was very desperate, and it was not long until Judah was carried into captivity for her sins. The turning away from God and His word in our day is as God foresaw that it would be (II Tim. iii, 1-5; iv, 3, 4; II Pet. iii, 3, 4; Luke xvii, 26-30), but He will build His church and take her to Himself and bring her back with Him in glory, and Israel shall then welcome Him, and they shall never be unrighteous any more, but shall be a blessing to all nations, and the earth shall be filled with His glory through Israel, His chosen messengers, according to Ps. lxvii.

Among the Canadians recently decorated with the D. S. O. was Major S. C. Norsworthy, a nephew of Mrs. (Rev.) J. H. Watts of Walkerton. The gazette stated that Major Norsworthy went forward under very heavy fire and established a firm defensive flank. His example and forethought were an inspiration to the Battlion.

Bruce Old Boys Annual Convention at Vanouver.

Bruce county old boys and girls filled O'Brien Hall, Vancouver, when the annual meeting of the Bruce County Boys' Association was held. In addition to the election of officers and a musical program a dance was held. Not all the Bruce County residents in the city were present, for it is doubtful if the hall would have held them all had they been there, for Bruce county people boast of a larger representation in the city than any other of the counties in old Ontario. Despite the numerous gatherings of a similar nature in the past, it was found that all the best stories of early days in Bruce have not been told—not up to that night at least—for many delightful reminiscences were told during the evening.

The program reminded Bruceites of an old-fashioned entertainment "down East" bearing a close resemblance to a Scottish night. Miss [illegible] Robertson gave some Highland dancing, Mrs. Billie Mondie and Mr. Percy Reed sang, and Mrs. John Paul [illegible]

Died Of Pneumonia

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Steffler of Ambleside was saddened by the death of their second son, John, which took place recently after a three weeks' illness with pneumonia. The deceased was fifteen years old, and was a bright, pleasant mannered boy. Some time ago he underwent three operations at Walkerton hospital for appendicitis and gall trouble, but he had fully recovered, and was enjoying splendid health when he was seized with pneumonia, to which he succumbed. The funeral took place to the Formosa R. C. cemetery. Much sympathy is felt for the bereaved family.

That Wet Year

The Telescope referred two weeks ago to the bad season of 1869 when the farmers in this district did not harvest their crops. The Clinton New Era adds the following information: In the County of Perth the harvest was late, and it is a fact that there were some fields of oats which were never got into the barn. The snow came to stay on October 18. Most of the potatoes and a large share of the turnips were not dug, while the apples were not gathered. As the ground was not frozen the potatoes [illegible] were dug in the spring and [illegible] out all right.

Bruce Good Roads

Engineer Huber of the Good Roads Dept., who visited Port Elgin last week said to the Times publisher:—"Bruce county has at some time or other in the past taken a great deal of pains with its roads, and as a result we find a good roadbed, the grade good, and taking it altogether the cost of construction and upkeep is going to be light with you, as compared with some other counties." "Will you begin any work of construction in Bruce county before the war ends?" "Not likely. Of course, these are all county roads now under the Good Roads System, and we must see that they are not allowed to deteriorate in any sense. Any work that is done now of a repair or maintenance nature will be done with an eye to permanency," said Mr. Huber.

Stole the Booze Away

There is no further news as to where the two cases of liquor belonged that were seized at the station, and mentioned in our last issue, says the Paisley Advocate. There is also no information available as to where the stuff has gone to. It was thought to be safely incarcerated in the village lock up, in the town hall basement, but it has disappeared. The fact that the lock of the door was broken is taken for substantial evidence that the wet goods were feloniously abstracted from the hiding place. Mr. J. C. Gilbert, J. Advertising!

in its highest sense is the creation of a new want and providing the means with which to apply that want. The aim of Advertising is not to spread the name of a firm so much as to get business for that firm. The ad. that counts is the one that makes the luxuries of today the necessities of tomorrow. A great many people advertise as they give to charity—merely to get rid of a solicitor. Then the advertiser says it doesn't pay and when done in that spirit it does not. Advertisers must put brain and selling force into their their copy, and when this is done they find that advertising is not an expense, but the finest kind of an investment. —S. C. Dobbs, past president Associated Advertising Clubs of America.

Capt. F. A. Bassett and daughter, Faith, of Collingwood, Mrs. Black and three children of Dryden, New Ontario, who have been visiting at Mr. Dippell's, and Miss Vera Dippell, left Friday noon on a motor trip to Collingwood.

Mr. Joseph Whitehead is able to be about again after a very serious siege of appendicitis and peretonitis at the Bruce County Hospital. As soon as he has regained strength, Mr. Whitehead intends to return to the Hospital for an operation.

PROCLAMATION

To the Citizens of Bruce County:

In connection with the request of the Lieut. Governor of the Province of Ontario, I hereby call upon the loyal citizens of the County of Bruce, to again, on the third anniversary of the war, solemnly pledge ourselves as to the righteousness of the Allied cause:

To record our inalienable loyalty to our beloved Mother Country.

To acknowledge and impress upon our children and all people that although this war is fought upon a foreign land, it is our fight, and we are in defence of our homes.

To honor the heroes who have fallen in defence of our country.

To support and assist those who are bereft of heroic men, who have laid down their lives in our behalf.

To thank those on land and sea who are prepared to give up their lives in our defence.

To pledge ourselves to give assistance to every cause and work which may bring victory to the Allied cause.

And to pray that Almighty God may aid the cause of the Allies for universal peace.

WALKERTON AND HYDRO

Town Council has Only to Steer a StraightCourse, Following the Mandate Given by the Ratepayers

The Herald & Times suggests that the Town Council shelve hydro until after the war and sign up with the local power company at "hydro rates". As the Town Council received a very emphatic mandate from the people last January it is not likely to be sidetracked by any such suggestion from the Times or from any other source. The Council has acknowledged its responsibility to submit a hydro money by-law to the ratepayers without delay, and though they have not done so yet, due apparently to delay at the Toronto end, we believe they have not relaxed one whit in their determination to deliver the goods. The Hydro Electric Power Commission has been working on a plan to link up Walkerton, and a number of surrounding municipalities so as to get the cheapest possible power. For Walkerton to throw a monkey wrench into the machinery by backing out at this juncture would drive cheap current back into the dim and distant future so far as this town is concerned. "Hydro rates" by a local company sounds fine. But what are hydro rates? Hydro rates mean absolute cost, a cost brought down ever so low by three hundred towns and cities working together. It means a cost much lower than what current costs a private company. How much below actual cost does the Herald Times suppose any local power company could sell its "juice" and still stay in business? The company might offer us the same rates as Chesley, where hydro has only recently started and the rate has only got nicely started on its downward course or it might give us the same figures as Harriston, where they enjoy the highest hydro rate in Ontario, power having to be brought some 200 miles from Niagara Falls, but to expect real hydro rates from a local company is absurd on the face of it.

FATE IS UNKNOWN

CAPT. ERIC ROBERTSON

Daring young Flight Commander who has been missing since July 12th. His machine was hit by anti-aircraft gun as he led a formation of British planes, and went down out of control from over 13,000 feet.

Over Sixty Recruits.

Major Nelson, who has been in charge of recruiting the past three months, was recalled to London on Monday. Major Nelson and his staff secured between sixty and seventy recruits, possibly the best showing of any recruiting staff in this Military District. Lieut. Pinkerton and Sergt. Art Taggart are still here.

Coming Along Fine.

Harry Denny is making a good recovery from his recent accident and expects to start doing a little work next week. Harry came through pluckily and will have a foot almost as good as ever. He can't say enough for the kidness and attention he received from the staff during his stay at the County Hospital.

Gets Promotion

Herman Runstadtler of the Guelph Battery was home from Petawawa Camp on a few days leave last week. Hermie has been given a stripe since his last visit home and now has the rank of Bombardier. Sixteen brigades or 64 batteries of Artillery are now in training at Petawawa which is an immense property containing 100,000 acres.

Seriously Wounded

Died of Heart Failure

Mrs P. Ritchie had further particulars this week regarding her brother, Mr. Alex Robertson, whose death at Zion City, Ill. was announced by wire last week. It appears that Mr. Robertson who was a robust man in the prime of life, dropped dead while crossing the station platform as he was about to set out on a short journey. Death was due to heart failure.

Bakery Changes Hands.

Mr. David Taggart has bought the East End Bakery and Confectionery from Mr. A. Hehn. Mr. Hehn found it impossible to secure help. He will remain and bake for Mr. Taggart. Mr. Taggart has bought Mr. Hehn's residence in the South Ward and has removed to the flat over the store. Mr Taggart has up-to-date business ideas and should make a successful merchant.

Wins Military Medal

A Former Walkerton boy, Signaller Jack Wilson, son of Mr. D. C. Wilson of Toronto, has won the proud destinction of being recommended for the Military Medal for bravery on the battlefield. Jack is at present in England recovering from a gunshot wound in the arm. Signaller Wilson was born in Brant 23 years ago. He enlisted in August 1915 and reached France in June of last year. His younger brother, Alex., enlisted at St. Catherines and has been in France since last December. The Wilson boys are nephews of Mr. T. H. Wilson, Durham Road, and Mr. Robert Wilson of Walkerton.

THE TOWN COUNCIL

Engineers' Report re Walkerton Power Plant Not Yet Considered by Hydro Electric Commission -Coun.McCarter Consents to Stick.

The Town Council held its regular monthly meeting Monday night and dealt with quite a lot of business. The Board will meet again in two weeks to strike the tax rate.

Town Clerk Collins reported that he had seen Messrs. Major Henderson and Robt. Goode and had asked them to sign a statement acknowledging the land which they use for driveways int their places to be the property of the town. He said both gentlemen disclaimed having any rights over the property but declined to sign.

Reeve Russell urged in that case that both parties be immediately notified not to trespass on the town's property, in accordance with the resolution passed at the previous meeting of the Council. Mr. Collins promised to notify them at once.

A resolution was submitted by Coun. Sanderson and Reeve Russell urging Coun. Alex McCarter to withdraw his letter of resignation, that the town might continue to have the advantage of his efficient services. Coun. McCarter said that a large number of citizens had come to him the last few days and urged him to stay on the job and he had therefore decided to stick. "Sandy" is therefore still on the job and will continue to give his best efforts to advance the interests of the town.

Mr. Collins read a letter from the Hydro Electric Power Commission stating that the engineer's report re the Walkerton plant would be considered by the Comission at an early date, after which the Council would be communicated with at once.

Invitations were received to send delegates to the Can. Municipal Association at London on August 27th, 28th and 29th, and to the Ont. Mun. Ass'n at Toronto on August 28th, 29th and 30th. Both letters were fyled.

Mrs. H. M. Lay, treas. of the Hospital Aid asked for refund of rent of Council Chamber for Hospital Tea.—Granted.

Chairman McKinnon promised to try to get a substitute for Eng. Wilton of the Pumping Station to let him have his week's holidays beginning Sept. 3rd.

Engineer R. McDowell of Owen Sound who was engaged to examine the water course of the Silver Creek where it flooded so disastrously on July 1st. reported that the flood bad been due to abnormal waterfall which might not happen again in a long time. The creek bed in private property had been allowed to get plugged up with water cress. He advised that the creek bed be cleaned out and suggested that this be charged up to the individual property owners. The creek bed on town property was perfectly clear and he did not consider the council responsible for the damage caused by flooding.

Messrs L. C. Benton and H. M. Lay presented the claims of the Hospital for larger support than in past years. Mr. Benton stated that last year the Council was sympathetic but was unable to do much as the tax rate had already been struck. Mr. Lay showed that the Hospital Board spent ten thousand dollars a year in the town besides caring for the town's free patients. Action was deferred by the Council to the Special meeting on Aug 27th, when a special levy for the hospital may be made in the tax rate.

The report of a recent milk inspection by Chief Ferguson was read. No 20 (Russell's) tested 2.9; No 30 (Dippell's) tested 3.3.

Mayor Johnston pointed out that one of the milkmen came below the mark of 3 which was required by the Town Bylaw. He understood Mr. Russell claimed it was not a fair test, the milk being taken out of the bottom of a can and had not been stirred. Mr. N. C McKay who tested the milk agreed that it should be stirred. He suggested that the Chief go to Mr. McKay and get full instructions as to the proper way of taking the milk and then if the milk did not come up to the mark, he would take legal proceedings against the milkman, no matter who he was.

Reeve Russell said he did not want to break the by-law. If he could not live up to the terms of the by-law, he would quit the milk business. He stated that the milk had not received a fair test. He did not blame the Chief for that, because the Chief was not properly informed.

Coun. McGregor asked whether the stables had been examined, according to the by-law.

Mayor Johnston replied that Dr. Fortune was to inspect the stables etc. but no report had been received yet.

COLLINGWOOD has found the use of tarvia both economical and effective. The roads were prepared for its application at comparatively little expense ($275 or $300 a block on residental streets) and then they improve from year to year, with each application. Tarvia makes a waterproof road, getting rid of the mud. It also does away with the need for oiling. The application costs from 5 to 15 cents per foot of frontage, according to the width of the street.

IT is argued that those who say that conscription of men should be accompanied by conscription of wealth are merely looking for an excuse to oppose the former measure. If that is true to any extent, it is the duty of the Government to destroy the excuse. The Government has taken the opposite course. It has surrendered to the profiteers. The income tax may be fair enough in itself, as a measure for exacting taxation from persons who are in comfortable circumstances, but it hardly touches profits, and allows the profiteers not only to escape bearing their fair share of war-burdens, but to accumulate huge fortunes out of the war itself. — Toronto Star.

New Post Cards

The Post Office Department are issuing a post card in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation. The card used is the ordinary postcard, with an insert containing information of the various Provinces existing in 1867 and now, also statistical information in regard to the area, population, general development, and industry of the country since 1867. The department has also in contemplation the issuing of a commemorative three-cent stamp, to consist of an engraved reproduction of Harris' painting Fathers of Confederation. It is now ready.

Young Kincardine Hero

Jack Anderson, a lad about 12 years of age, is a real hero. At Inverhuron the other day, Miss Daniels, a trained nurse from Durham, who was in bathing got into a deep hole, and was drowning. Young Anderson without hesitation went to her aid and caught her by the hair and swam with her toward the dock. Miss Belle Drummond tried to assist the lad, but got into the hole. Her sister, Jennie, went to her assistance, and in a few moments three girls, unable to swim, were struggling in water 30 feet deep. Jack Anderson succeeded in getting Miss Daniels safely to the dock, and Delbert Span plunged in and saved the Drummond sisters. It was a narrow call for all three. The affair occurred at a private picnic party.

TRUE ECONOMY

DEMANDS THE USE OF MORE PURITY FLOUR

There is more actual food value in ONE POUND OF PURITY FLOUR than there is in One Pound of Beef, One Pound of Potatoes and One Pound of Milk COMBINED.

The truly economical housewife must take advantage of this great strength in PURITY FLOUR over other food substances by serving more frequently the delicious bread and rolls, toothsome, dainty cakes and crisp, mouth-melting pastry which are among the possibilities of this perfectly milled product of the world-famous Western Canada wheat.

"It is I—Jaimihr Khan," he answered o the muffled hail from within. "Yes, General Sahib, I will wait."

He turned and looked toward Woodhouse. The latter had taken a cigarette from the case Almer had sent him through Jane and was turning it over in his hand curiously. The Indian, treading like a hunting cat, began lighting candles. His tour of the room brought him to the captain's side, and there he stood motionless until Woodhouse, with a start, observed him.

"Cap-tain Wood-house has been most in-discreet," he said in his curious mechanical way of speech.

Woodhouse turned on him angrily.

"What do you mean?" he snapped.

"Is it that they have ceased to teach discretion—at—the Wilhelmstrasse?" The Indian's face was a mask.

"I know nothing about the Wilhelmstrasse," the white man answered in a voice suddenly strained.

"Then it is verse, verse foolish, for the captain to leave in his room these plans." Jaimihr Khan took from his girdle a thin roll of blue prints, the plans of the signal tower and Room D, which Almer had given Woodhouse the night before. He held them gingerly between slender thumb and forefinger.

Woodhouse recoiled.

"The general sahib has sent me to search the cap-tain's room," the even voice of Jaimihr Khan ran on. "Behold the results of my journey!"

Woodhouse sent a lightning glance at the door leading to the governor's room, then stepped lightly away from the Indian and regarded him with hard, calculating eyes.

"What do you propose to do—with those plans?"

"What should I do?" The white shoulders of the Indian went up in a shrug. "They will stand you before a wall, Cap-tain Wood-house. And fire. It is the price of an in-discretion at a time like this."

Woodhouse's right hand whipped back to his holster, which hung from his sword belt, and came forward again with a thick, short barreled weapon in it.

"Give me those plans, you yellow hound!"

"Shoot!" Jaimihr Khan smiled. "Add one in-discretion to another. Shoot, my youthful fool!"

The door to General Crandall's room opened, and the general, in uniform evening dress, stepped into the library. Woodhouse swiftly slipped his revolver behind his back, though keeping it ready for instant use.

"All ready, captain. Smoke." The general extended his cigarette case toward Woodhouse.

The latter smilingly declined, his eyes all the while on the Indian, who stood by the corner of the general's desk. Between the sleek brown hands a tiny blue roll of paper was twisting into a narrower wisp under the careless manipulation of thin fingers.

"Well, Jaimihr," Crandall briskly addressed the servant, "have you completed the errand I sent you on?"

"Yes, General Sahib." The brown fingers still caressed the plans of the signal tower.

"Have you anything to report?" The general had his cigarette in his mouth and was pawing his desk for a match. Jaimihr Khan slowly lifted the tip of the paper wisp in his fingers to the flame of a candle on the end of the desk, then held the burning tip to his master's cigarette.

"Nothing, General Sahib."

"Very good. Come, Woodhouse; sorry to have kept you waiting." The general started for the double doors. Woodhouse followed. He passed very close to the Indian, but the latter made no sign. His eyes were on the burning wisp of paper between his fingers.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Pendulum of Fate.

THE next day, Thursday, was one of hectic excitement for Gibraltar. Focus of the concentrated attention of town and Rock was the battle fleet, clogging all the inner harbor with its great gray hulks. Superdreadnaughts, like the standing walls of a submerged Atlantis, lay close to the quays, barges lashed along side the folded booms of their torpedo nets. Behind them, battle cruisers and scouts formed a protecting cordon. Far out across the entrance to the harbor the darting black shapes of destroyers on constant guard were shuttles trailing their threads of smoke through the blue web of sea and sky. Between fleet and shore snorting cockleshells of launches established lanes of communication, khaki of the Rock's defenders and blue of the fleet's officers met, passed and repassed. In wardroom and club lounge glasses were touched in pledges to the united service. The high commander of the Mediterranean fleet paid his official visit to the governor of Gibraltar, and the governor in turn was received with honors upon the quarterdeck of the flagship. But under the superficial courtesies of fanfare and present arms the stern business of coaling fleet progressed at high tension. It was necessary that all of the fighting machines have their bunkers filled by noon of the following day. Every minute that the channel up under the murky North sea fogs lay without full strength of her fleet protection was added danger for England.

That morning Captain Woodhouse went on duty in the signal tower. Major Bishop, his superior, had summoned him to his office immediately after breakfast and assigned him to his tasks there. Sufficient proof, Woodhouse assured himself, with elation, that he had come through the fire in General Crandall's library, tested and found genuine. Through this pretext and that, he had been kept off duty the day before and denied access to the slender stone tower high up on the Rock's crest which was the motor center of Gibraltar's ganglia of defense.

The small office in which Woodhouse was installed was situated at the very top of the tower—a room glassed on four sides like the lantern room of a lighthouse and provided with telescope, a telephone switchboard, range finders and all the complicated machinery of gunfire control. On one side were trestle boards supporting charts of the ranges, figured areas representing every square yard of water from the nearest harbor below out to the farthest reaching distance of the monster disappearing guns. A second graphic sheet showed the harbor and anchorages and the entrance to the straits; this map was thickly spotted with little red, numbered dots—the mines. Sown like a turnip field with these deadly capsules of destruction were all the waters thereabouts; their delicate tendrils led under water and through conduits in the Rock up this slender spire called the signal tower. As he climbed the winding stairway to his newly assigned post Woodhouse had seen painted on a small wooden door just below the room he was to occupy the single white letter "D."

Room D—where the switches were where a single sweep of the hand could loose all the bidden death out there in the crowded harbor—it lay directly below his feet.

He had much time for thought, and much to think about.

Yesterday's scene in the library of Government House—his grilling by the two suspicious men, when a false answer on his part would have been the first step toward a firing squad. Yes, and what had followed between himself and the little American—the girl who had protected and aided him—ah, the pain of that trial was hardly less poignant than had been the terror of the one preceding it. She had asked him to prove to her that he was not what she thought him. But before another day was past she would be out of his life and would depart, believing—yes, convinced—that the task he had set himself to do was a dishonorable one. She could not know that the soldiers of the hidden army have claim to heroism no less than they who join battle under the sun. But he was to see Jane Gerson once more; Woodhouse caught at this circumstance as something precious. Tonight at Government House Lady Crandall's dinner to the refugee Americans on the eve of their departure would offer a last opportunity. How could he turn it to the desire of his heart?

One more incident of a crowded yesterday gave Woodhouse a crust for rumination—the unmasking Jaimihr Khan, the Indian, had elected for himself at that critical minute when it lay in his power to betray the stranger in the garrison. The captain reviewed the incident with great satisfaction—how of a sudden the wily Indian had changed from an enemy holding a man's life in his hand to that "friend in Government House" of whose existence the cautious Almer had hinted, but whose identity he had kept concealed. Almer had said that this "friend" could lay his hand on the combination to room D in the signal tower when the proper moment arrived. Now that he knew Jaimihr Khan in his true stripe Woodhouse made no doubt of his ability to fulfill Almer's prophecy.

And the proper moment would be this night! Tonight, on the eve of the great fleet's sailing, what Woodhouse had come to Gibraltar to do must be accomplished or not at all.

Lady Crandall's dinner in government house was in full tide of hilarity. Under the heavy groined ceiling the spread table, with its napery and silver, was the one spot of light in the long shadowed dining room. Round it sat the refugees—folk who had eaten black bread and sausage and called that a meal, who had dodged and twisted under the careless scourge of a war beyond their understanding and sympathies, ridden in springless carts, been bullied and hectored by military martinets and beggared by panicky banks. Now with the first glimpse of freedom already in sight and under the warming influence of an American hostess' real American meal they were swept off their feet by high spirits almost childlike. Henry J. Sherman, Kewanee's vagrant son returning from painful pilgrimage, sat at the right of Lady Crandall. His pink face was glowing with humor. To Consul Reynolds, who swore he would have to pay for thus neglecting his consulate for so much as two hours, had fallen the honor of escorting Mrs. Sherman to table. Willy Kimball, polished as to shirt bosom and sleek hair, had eyes and ears for none but the blithe Kitty. Next to General Crandall sat Jane Gerson, radiant in a dinner gown of tricky gauze overlaid on silk. At her right was Captain Woodhouse in proper uniform dinner coat faced with red and gold. Of the whole company Woodhouse alone appeared constrained. The girl by his side had been cool in her greeting that evening. To his conversational sallies she had answered with indifference, and now at table she divided her favors between General Crandall and the perky little consul across the table. It seemed to Woodhouse that she purposely added a lash of cruelty to her joy at the approaching departure on the morrow.

The talk turned to art, and the man from Kewanee even had the stolid general wiping the tears from his eyes by the description and criticism of some of the masters his wife had trotted him around to admire.

"Willy, you'll be interested to know we got a painter in Kewanee now," Henry J. cried. "'Member young Frank Coates—old Henry Coates' son? Well, he turned out to be an artist. Too bad, too; his folks was fine people. But Frank was awfully headstrong about art. Painted a war picture about as big as that wall there. Couldn't find a buyer right away, so he turned it over to Tim Burns, who keeps the saloon on Main street. Been busy ever since, sorta taking it out in trade, you might say."

Table talk was running at a gay rate when Mrs. Sherman, who had sent frequent searching glances at Captain Woodhouse over the nodding buds of the flower piece in the center of the board, suddenly broke out:

"Aw, Captain Woodhouse, now I remember where I've seen you before! I thought your face was familiar the minute I set my eyes on you this evening."

Jaimihr Khan, who stood behind the general's chair, arms folded and motionless, swiftly lifted one hand to his lips, but immediately mastered himself again. General Crandall looked up with a sharp crinkle of interest between his eyes. Captain Woodhouse, unperturbed, turned to the Kewanee dowager.

"You have seen me before, Mrs. Sherman?"

"I am sure of it," the lady announced with decision. The other diners were listening now.

"Indeed! And where?" Woodhouse was smiling polite attention.

"Why, at the Winter Garden, in Berlin, a month ago!" Mrs. Sherman was hugely satisfied with her identification.

Jaimihr Khan Lifted One Hand to His Lips.

She appealed to her husband for confirmation. "Remember, father, that gentleman I mistook for Albert Downs back home, that night we saw that—er—wicked performance?"

"Can't say I do," Sherman answered tolerantly.

Woodhouse, still smiling, addressed Mrs. Sherman:

"Frightfully sorry to disappoint you, Mrs. Sherman, but I was not in Berlin a month ago. I came here from Egypt, where I had been several years." Woodhouse heard Jane at his elbow catch her breath.

"See, mother, there you go on your old hobby of recognizin' folks," Sherman chided. Then, to the others: "Why, she's seen all Kewanee since she came here to Europe. Even got a glimpse of the Methodist minister at Monte Carlo."

"I have never been in Berlin in my life, Mrs. Sherman," Woodhouse was adding. "So, of course"—

"Well, I suppose I am wrong," the lady admitted. "But still I could swear."

The governor, who had kept a cold eye on his subordinate during this colloquy, now caught Woodhouse's glance. The captain smiled frankly.

"Another such unexpected identification, general, and you'll have me in the cells as a spy, I dare say," he remarked.

"Quite likely," Crandall answered shortly, and took up his fork again. A maid stepped to Lady Crandall's chair at this juncture and whispered something. The latter spoke to Woodhouse:

"You're wanted on the telephone in the library, captain. Very important, so the importunate person at the other end of the wire informs the maid."

Woodhouse looked his confusion.

"Probably that silly ass at the quay who lost a bag of mine when I landed," he apologized as he rose. "If you'll pardon me"—

Woodhouse passed up the stairs and into the library. He was surprised to find Jaimihr Khan standing by the telephone, his hand just in the act of setting the receiver back on the hook. The Indian stepped swiftly to the double doors and shut them behind the captain.

"A thousand pardons, cap-tain"—he spoke hurriedly—"the cap-tain will stand near the telephone. They may come from the dining room at any minute."

"What is all this?" Woodhouse began. "I was called on the telephone."

"A call I had inspired, cap-tain. It was necessary to see you—at once and alone."

"Tactless! With the general suspecting me. You heard what that woman from America said at the table. She has eyes in her head."

"I think he still trusts you, cap-tain," the Indian replied. "And tonight we must act. The fleet sails at noon tomorrow."

"We?" Woodhouse was on his guard at once. "What do you mean by 'we'?"

Jaimihr Khan smiled at the evasion.

"Yesterday in this room, cap-tain, I burned a roll of plans"—

"Which I had good reason to wish saved," Woodhouse caught him up.

"No matter, I burned them—at a moment when you were—in great peril, cap-tain."

"Burned them, yes; perhaps to trap me further."

The Indian made a gesture of impatience. "Oh, excellent discretion!" he cried in suppressed exasperation. "But we waste time that is precious. Tonight"—

"Before another word is spoken let me have your card—your Wilhelmstrasse number," Woodhouse demanded.

"I carry no card. I am more discreet than—some," the other answered insinuatingly.

"No card? Your number, then?"

Jaimihr Khan brought his lips close to the white man's ear and whispered a number.

"Is that not correct?" he asked.

Woodhouse nodded curtly.

"And now that we are properly introduced," Jaimihr began, with a sardonic smile, "may I venture a criticism? Your pardon, cap-tain, but out critics they help us to per-fection. Since when have men who come from the Wilhelmstrasse allowed themselves to make love in drawing rooms?"

"You mean"—

"You and the young woman from America—when I found you together here yesterday"—

"That is my affair," was Woodhouse's hot response.

"The affair on which we work—this night—that is my affair, be verse sure!" There was something of menace in the Indian's tone.

Woodhouse bowed to his demand for an explanation. "That young woman, as it happens, must be kept on our side. She saw me in France, when Captain Woodhouse was supposed to be in Egypt."

"Ah, so?" Jaimihr inclined his head with a slight gesture craving pardon. "For that reason you make a conquest. I did not un-derstand."

"No matter. The fleet sails at noon."

"And our moment is here—tonight," Jaimihr whispered in exultation. "Not until tonight did they admit you to the tower, cap-tain. How is it there?"

"A simple matter—with the combination to the door of Room D."

With a single stride the Indian was over before the door of the wall safe. He pointed.

"The combination of the inner door—it is in a special compartment of that safe, protected by many wires. Before dawn I cut the wires and come to you with the combination."

"At whatever hour is best for you," Woodhouse put in eagerly.

"Let us say 3:30," Jaimihr answered. "You will be waiting for me at the Hotel Splendide with—our friends there. I shall come to you there, give you the combination, and you shall go through the lines to the signal tower."

"There must be no slip," Woodhouse sternly warned.

"Not on my part, cap-tain—count on that. For five years I have been waiting, waiting. Five years a servant—yes, my general; no, my general; very good, my general." The man's voice vibrated with hate. "Tomorrow, near dawn—the English fleet shattered and ablaze in the harbor—the water red, like blood, with the flames. Then, by the breath of Allah, my service ends!"

CHAPTER XIX.

A Defiance.

VOICES sounded in the hallway outside the double doors. Jaimihr Khan, a finger to his lips, nodded as he whispered, "Three-thirty at the Splendide." He faded like a white wraith through the door to General Crandall's room as the double doors opened and the masculine faction of the dinner party entered. Woodhouse rose from a stooping position at the telephone and faced them. To the general, whose sharp scrutiny stabbed like thin knives, he made plausible explanation. The beggar who lost his bag wanted a complete identification of it—had run it down at Algeciras.

"I understand," Crandall grunted.

When the cigars were lit General Crandall excused himself for a minute, sat at his desk and hurriedly scratched a note. Summoning Jaimihr, he ordered that the note be dispatched by orderly direct to Major Bishop and given to no other hands. Woodhouse, who overheard his superior officer's command, was filled with vague apprehension. What Mrs. Sherman had said at table—this hurried note to Bishop; there was but one interpretation to give to the affair—Crandall's suspicions were all alive again. Yet at 3:30—at the Hotel Splendide.

But when Crandall came back to join the circle of smokers he was all geniality. The women came in by way of Jane Gerson's room; they had been taking a farewell peek at her dazzling stock of gowns, they said, before they were packed for the steamer.

"There was one or two I just had to see again," Mrs. Sherman explained for the benefit of all, "before I said goodby to them."

"Well, don't get into trouble with the minister, mother," Henry J. warned. "Some of the French gowns I've seen on this trip certainly would stir things up in Kewanee."

Jaimihr served the coffee. Woodhouse tried to maneuver Jane into a tete-a-tete in an angle of the massive fireplace, but she outgeneraled him, and the observant Mrs. Sherman cornered him inexorably.

"Tell me, Captain Woodhouse," she began in her friendly tones, "you said awhile ago the general might mistake you for a spy. Don't you have a great deal of trouble with spies in your army in wartime? Everybody took us for spies in Germany, and in France they thought poor Henry was carrying bombs to blow up the Eiffel tower."

"Perhaps I can answer that question better than Captain Woodhouse," the general put in, rising and striding over to where Mrs. Sherman kept the captain prisoner. "Captain Woodhouse, you see, would not be so likely to come in touch with those troublesome persons as one in command of a post, like myself." The most delicate irony barbed this speech, lost to all but the one for whom it was meant.

"Oh, I know I'm going to hear something very exciting!" Mrs. Sherman chortled. "Kitty, you'd better hush up Willy Kimball for awhile and come over here. You can improve your mind better listening to the general."

Crandall soon was the center of a group. He began, with sober directness:

"Well, in the matter of spies in wartime, Mrs. Sherman, one is struck by the fact of their resemblance to the plague—you never can tell when they're going to get you or whence they came. Now, here on the Rock I have reason to believe we have one or more spies busy this minute."

Jane Gerson, sitting where the light smote her face, drew back into the shadow with a swift movement of protectiveness. Woodhouse, who balanced a dainty Satsuma coffee cup on his knee, kept his eyes on his superior's face with a mildly interested air.

"In fact," Crandall continued evenly, "I shouldn't be surprised if one, possibly two, spies should be arrested before the night is over. And the point about this that will interest you ladies is that one of these, the one whose order for arrest I have already given, is a woman—a very clever and pretty woman, I may add to make the story more interesting."

"And the other, whose arrest may follow, is an accomplice of hers, I take it, general?" Woodhouse put the question with easy indifference. He was stirring his coffee abstractedly.

"Not only the accomplice, but the brains for both, captain—a deucedly clever person, I'm frank to admit."

"Oh, people, come and see the flagship, signaling to the rest of the fleet with its funny green and red lights!"

"And the other is an accomplice of hers."

It was Jane, who had suddenly risen and stood by the curtains screening the balcony windows. "They look like little flowers opening and shutting."

The girl's diversion was sufficient to take interest momentarily from General Crandall's revelation. When all had clustered around the windows conversation skipped to the fleet, its power and the men who were ready to do battle behind its hundreds of guns. Mrs. Sherman was disappointed that the ships did not send up rockets. She'd read somewhere that ships sent up rockets, and she didn't see why these should prove the exception. Interruption came from Jaimihr Khan, who bore a message for Consul Reynolds. The fussy little man ripped open the envelope with an air of importance.

"Ah, listen, folks! Here we have the latest wireless from the Saxonia: 'Will anchor about 2—sail 6. Have all passengers aboard by 5:30.'" Excited gurgles from the refugees. "That means," Reynolds wound up with a flourish, "everybody at the docks by 5 o'clock. Be there myself to see you off. Must go now—lot of fuss and feathers getting everybody fixed." He paused before Jane.

"You're going home at last, young lady," he chirped.

"That depends entirely on Miss Gerson herself." It was the general who spoke quietly, but emphatically.

Reynolds looked at him, surprised.

"Why, I understood it was all arranged"—

"I repeat, it depends entirely on Miss Gerson."

Woodhouse caught the look of fear in Jane's eyes, and, as they fell for the instant on his, something else—appeal. He turned his head quickly. Lady Crandall saved the situation.

"Oh, that's just some more of George's eternal red tape. I'll snip it when the time comes."

The consul's departure was the signal for the others. They crowded around Lady Crandall and her husband with voluble praise for the American dinner and thanks for the courtesy they had found on the Rock. Woodhouse, after a last despairing effort to have a word of farewell with Jane, which she denied, turned to make his adieu to his host and hostess.

"No hurry, captain," Crandall caught him up. "Expect Major Bishop in every minute—small matter of official detail. You and he can go down the Rock together when he leaves."

Woodhouse's mind leaped to the meaning behind his superior's careless words. The hastily dispatched note—that was to summon Bishop to Government House; Crandall's speech about the spies, and now this summary order that he wait the arrival of Bishop. Would the arrest be here in this room? The man who carried a number from the Wilhelmstrasse felt the walls of the library slowly closing in to crush him. He could almost hear the whisper and mutter of the inexorable machine moving them closer—closer. He alone with the man whose word could send bullets into his heart!

"A very pleasant dinner, Lady Crandall's." Woodhouse began, eager to lighten the tenseness of the situation.

"Yes, it seemed so." Crandall offered the younger man his cigarette case and, lighting a smoke himself, straddled the hearth, his eyes keenly observant of Woodhouse's face.

"Rather odd, Americans, but jolly nice." The captain laughed in reminiscence of the unspoiled Shermans.

"I thought so—I married one," Crandall retorted.

The ear of Woodhouse's mind could hear more plainly now the grinding of the cogs; the immutable power of fate lay there.

"Oh—er—so you did. Very kind she has been to me. I get very little of this sort of thing at Wady Halfa."

"By the way, Woodhouse"—Crandall blew a contemplative puff toward the ceiling—"strange Mrs. Sherman should have thought she saw you at Berlin."

"Odd mistake, to be sure," Woodhouse admitted, struggling to put ease into his voice. "The lady seems to have a penchant, as her husband says, for finding familiar faces."

Samara Held High Place Among Important Cities When World Was Young

THE ancient town of Samara, lying on the Tigris, some hundred miles up the river from Bagdad, enjoys a curious distinction. For about fifty years, in the Ninth Century, it was one of the first cities in the world. Before that time it had hardly even existed, and, after its short-lived greatness, it steadily fell into decay.

It was in the heyday of the power of the Kalifs of Bagdad that the story of Samara began. The reign of the famous Mamun, one of the greatest of the Abbasides, after the Kalif Mansur, had just come to a close, and the succession was sought by one Abu Ishak al Motasim. Motasim, as he has come to be known, had for a long time been preparing himself for this project. Every year he had bought Turkish slaves, and, when he accompanied Mamun on his last expedition, he had with him a formidable bodyguard composed of some 3,000 Turks. Backed by this force, he appears to have compelled Mamun to designate him his successor, and the chroniclers record that he wrote, in the name of the Kalif, to the authorities at Bagdad and elsewhere, intimating that he was to be Mamun's successor. His intentions, however, were not greeted with favor by the army, which insisted that Abbas, Mamun's son, should take his father's place. Abbas, however, publicly renounced all claims to the kalifate, and in the end the army, with that rapid change of front so common in those days, accepted Motasim, who hastened to Bagdad and made his public entry into the city as Kalif on September 20th, 833.

The people, apparently, received him well, but the new Kalif was determined to have more than one string to his bow for the purpose of making his position secure. The approval of the army and the people was well in its way, but he had secured the first steps of his progress with the aid of his Turkish bodyguard, and he had every intention of strengthening this arm of his service, rather than doing away with it. One of his first acts, therefore, on coming to Bagdad was to procure officers for his guard, and for this purpose he bought up all the Turkish slaves in Bagdad, who had in any way distinguished themselves, and many of them afterwards became famous. The Turks, however, were unruly and undisciplined, and they not only outraged the good people of Bagdad by their excesses, but scandalised them by the open contempt they displayed for the religious precepts of Islam. At last the people could stand it no longer, and they rose against the guard and slew as many as they could.

Motasim was in a serious difficulty. He dared not act with severity towards the city, so he decided to solve the problem by moving his capital. Proceeding up the Tigris, along much the same course as General Maude's forces have been following during the last few weeks, he came to the little town of Samara, close to the edge of the great Mesopotamian plateau. There he built himself a new residence, changing the name of the place from Samara, which could be interpreted to "Unhappy is he who sees it," to "Serra-man-raa, "Rejoiced is he who sees it." Motasim undertook the building of his new capital with energy, and, within less than ten years, Samara rivaled Bagdad in splendor. Palaces quickly rose on either side of the Tigris, and the minaret of the great mosque which he built was visible for many miles around. Then, Motasim's immediate successors continued to make the city their capital, and great sums were expended on it. Pleasure grounds were laid out on a large scale, and planted with palms from Basra; whilst exotic plants were imported from Syria and Khorassan. Canals were made in all directions, and the desert was transformed into a garden; whilst workmen were collected from every part of the empire, and teakwood, together with marble from Antioch, was imported on a colossal scale. As has been said, however, the days of Samaras' greatness were short. Within fifty years the kalifs had returned to Bagdad, and, with the decay of the kalifate, which quickly followed, Samara lost altogether that glory, the shadow of which, at any rate, Bagdad retained so long.

Three Races.

I have heard from several officers home from the front the following story of Sir Douglas Haig's estimate of the ruling qualities of the soldiers of the three home races under his command, says a writer in the Manchester Guardian. It is true that the account comes at third or fourth hand, but I believe that it is generally accepted at the front. Sir Douglas is said to have remarked that whenever a particularly brilliant and rapid piece of work was reported from any part of the line he thought it would be an Irish regiment, and usually it was so. If a remarkable piece of work had been done by men sticking it under tremendous fire, with no artillery help and holding the position against heavy assaults, he concluded that was an English regiment, and usually it was so. But when he was wrong in either case it was usually the Scottish. The Scottish he thought, were not quite so fiery and immediate in their operations as the Irish, but they were more so than the English, and not quite so tenacious in holding on under punishment as the English, but they were more so than the Irish.

THE COLONEL

Referring to Col. Sutherland of the 71st Battalion, now Commander of the Bruce Battalion. Lieut Leslie Young, composer of these lines, was a nephew of Mr and Mrs. J. B. Campbell of this town. It will be remembered he was killed in action last fall.

(Written by Lieut. Les. Young)

A man that can fight, a fighter who's fought,
A man to whom danger to self counts for naught,
A man all the way with a conduct sheet clean,
As a man and a soldier our Colonel's beloved
A man—Colonel Sutherland, that's whom I mean.
And admired by those among whom he has moved;
Admired, beloved, yet regarded with awe,
A man and a soldier, sans blemish or flaw
A man and a soldier, that's stamped on his face;
As a soldier, his record decades won't efface.
Insignificant, lowly and humble I feel,
When I look on his manhood, his grey eyes of steel.
To-day Canada's proud of the sons that she bore,
Proud as she is of her heroes of yore,
Proud of the man who will stick with the game,
Proud of the soldier upholding her fame.
In but six of His days, God created all earth,
Saved himself but the seventh to rest from his work,
And while resting from care on the seventh He planned
The man of the stamp of the Sutherland clan;
He moulded and made them and placed them on earth,
And the best of them all leads the 71st.

Harvest Well On

Farmers are well on with the harvest in this district. The help problem is not as serious here as in other parts of the Province and the good weather has contributed to the successful handling of the harvest. Barley and wheat are practically all cut. The barley is the best in many years. The wheat has made great advances the past three weeks and is almost normal. Oats are also a bumper crop, cutting has just commenced.

Caught Shoplifting

The young son of a respected Brant walked into Patterson Bros. hardware one day last week and helped himself freely to articles on the counter, when he thought no one way looking. He was detected and most of the goods recovered from his wagon. Chief Ferguson drove out to his place the following day and found out from him where he had hidden the rest of the stolen articles. Magistrate Tolton let him off with a fine of $5 and costs, amounting to about $25, after giving him some wholesome advice.

160th Reviewed by King

"I saw the King to-day for the first time" writes a Walkerton boy of the 160th. "He reviewed the Division in a march past in column of fours. The 160th was given the honor of leading the parade. That speaks very high for us being picked out from 16 battalions. Our Brigade Commander gave us great praise for the way we carried it out. The King is a small man but the Queen is a big woman. Princess Mary was there too. She is very good looking, and with the soldiers, needless to say she was the favorite".

Mayor Johnston said that the Chief should test the milk sold by all parties in town, not the two milkmen only, to conform to the by-law and instructed the Chief to do so next time.

Coun. Sanderson called attention to the prevalence of the disgusting habit of spewing tobacco juice on the sidewalk. Spitting on the walks was contrary to the by-laws of the town and he suggested that notices be printed reminding the public of that fact.

Town Clerk Collins caused a laugh by telling the Councillors that the matter had been gone into some years ago when it was found that there was only one spot in town where it was lawful to spit—at the Registry Office.

Reeve Russell asked that a traffic by-law be drawn up, requiring that all teams and vehicles on main street keep to their proper side of the road no matter whether they were passing other vehicles or not. The Reeve urged that the great increase in auto traffic makes such a by-law more than ever necessary. Most of the surrounding towns and villages have such regulations.

Coun. McKinnon called for a more stringent enforcement of the bicycle by-law.

R. McDowell C. E. reported that he had examined the property in East Ward where flooding had occurred on July 1st ruining several gardens. He recommended that a two foot drain be put through the Misses Walker's property. Report adopted.

Messrs John Vogt and George T. Stead, wrote for the destruction carried in their gardens along Silver Creek by flooding. The Council disclaimed liability and took no action regarding the claims.

INSTRUCTOR DIDN'T COME

Bruce Women Came Miles to Attend Demonstration which was Not Held Owing to Departmental Blunder

A large representation of ladies from the town and the surrounding country responded to the invitation to come and see fruit canned by a gov't. expert at the Town Hall last week. The ladies came but no demonstrator appeared. Tangles in the red tape at Toronto appear to have been responsible for the fizzle. This is the second time within a year that Bruce people have been the victims of departmental carelessness. Last summer prominent citizens came from all parts of the county to consult with the Chief Recruiting Officer but in reaching the County Town, they found the party of the second part conspicuous by his absence. To see that this sort of thing is irritating to people who have dropped their work in the middle of a busy season and have driven several miles, only to find that they have come on a fool's errand, is putting it mildly.

Arrangements were made by Mrs. M. J. Ramsey and Mrs. Wisser, the two Walkerton representatives at the Food Convention held at Toronto lately to have a demonstrator from the Department come to Walkerton. The department telephoned the lady demonstrator at London to go to Walkerton intimating that formal notice would be sent her later from the department. Instead of going ahead she waited for a confirmatory letter from the department which did not reach her. In the meantime, there being no time for the usual advertising, Mrs. Ramsey and some others, went to a great deal of trouble to get word to the women of town and county by phone and word of mouth. When the demonstrator phoned to a lady in town that it was too late to make train connections and she could not come, the women who had the arrangements in hand, unfortunately did not hear of the telephone message in time to send word to the country women not to come. Mrs. Ramsey has since received letters from the lady instructor expressing deep regret at disappointing the audience here and offering to arrange a future meeting if desired. It is probable that such a meeting will be held under the auspices of the I. O. D. E.

THEIR GOLDEN WEDDING

Celebrated by Mr. and Mrs. John Lambertus on Tuesday, August 7th.—All Members of Family Present

One of Walkerton's most venerable and highly respected couples, Mr. and Mrs. John Lambertus, celebrated their golden wedding anniversary on Tuesday, August 7th. It was fifty years ago to the day that John Lambertus, then a stalwart young farmer of Huron Township and Miss Catherine Phillips, youngest daughter of the late Mr and Mrs. Sebastian Phillips of Culross, were united in the holy bonds of matrimony at Riversdale R. C. church by the late Rev. Father Kelly. Mr. and Mrs. Lambertus took up farming for a year on the Elora Road, Carrick, after which they located on the fine property at Johnston's Corners, their 255 acre farm covering all four corners. Here they lived for nineteen years, retiring to Walkerton about thirty years ago. Both still enjoy very good health, and it is the wish of their very many friends that a kind Providence may permit them to enjoy many years of health and happiness. At the second ceremony which was celebrated at the R. C. Church on Aug. 7th, 1917, their son, Rev. Father Geo. Lambertus of Butte, Mont. was the celebrant priest and sang solemn high mass at ten o'clock. Rev. Father Hoffarth was deacon, and Rev Father Frieberger sub-deacon. Rev. Father Montag officiated as master of ceremonies, and Rev. Father Cummings preached the sermon, referring in eloquent terms to the dignity of marriage and publicly congratulating the worthy couple who has been spared to celebrate the jubilee anniversary of their wedding. Among those present were:— Rev. Father Capps of Teeswater, Rev. Father Haller of Deemerton, Rev. Father Brohman of Formosa, Rev. Father Zettler and Rev. Father Goodrow of Chepstow. After the ceremony the company repaired to their comfortable and spacious home and sat down to a very fine repast. Their entire family of three sons and five daughters were present: Dr. J. A. Lambertus of Eganville, Rev. Father George S. Lambertus of Butte, Mont., Peter Lambertus, druggist of Walkerton, Mrs. Simon Goetz of Carrick, Mrs. Louis Steffler of Culross, Mrs. Albert Waechter of Brant, Sister M. Georgina of Milwaukee and Miss Nellie at home. Twenty-six grandchildren were present. Mr. and Mrs. Lambertus received telegrams of congratulations from many outside points, and were the recipients of many handsome and costly presents.

The Crops in Sask.

Mr. George Lettner received a good summary of crop condition in Sask. in a lettergram received from his brother, Mr. Will Lettner who has just returned home from a visit to the East to look after the harvest on his big farm at Eyebrow, Sask. Will wired:—"Arrived safe. Found all well. Best wheat here good for twenty to thirty, other wheat from eight to fifteen. Oats, flax and barley short. Cutting starts about fifteenth. Send Walter and all help possible. We need lots. Weather good, wheat filling good, other crops doing fine.

THE PATHEPHONE

Five of these large cabinet phonographs, each with twelve records, given as first prizes in District Contests. Value, $150.00. Size 20 in. x 20½ in. x 44 in. high.

Enter the Bread Making Contests

at Rural School Fairs in Ontario

The Campbell Flour Mills Company's great offer of the big One-Hundred and-Fifty Dollar Pathe phonographs (Five of them!) and other valuable prizes, for the best loaves of bread baked with Cream of the West flour, is stirring up tremendous interest all over Ontario. Many girls are already busy as bees practising with Cream of the West flour. Last year many girls declared, "Oh, if I had only practised, I'm sure I could have won!" Don't wait another day. Decide right now! Practise, Practise, Practise with

the hard wheat flour that is guaranteed for bread

Every time you bake with it you find out new qualities in this flour that makes such splendid big loaves of delicious light bread. Practise!

In five districts, each comprising several counties, we will give away free to the winner of the first district prize a large cabinet phonograph. At each fair there will be given a fine list of local prizes.

Prizes Worth Trying Hard For

1st Local Prize.—"Girls' Own Annual," a great big beautifully bound, illustrated book with 800 pages of stories and articles about people, art, animals, gardens, sewing, crocheting—everything that particularly interests young girls, older girls and their mothers. This is a wonderful prize that you can treasure for years.

2nd Local Prize.—"Stories of Famous Men and Women," heavily cloth bound with gold titles, many beautiful pictures in colors, entrancing life stories of Florence Nightingale, Grace Darling, Flora MacDonald, Jenny Lind, the late Queen Victoria, and others.

3rd Local Prize.—"Britain Overseas," a big handsomely bound book with many colored pictures, interesting stories and descriptions of the countries and the peoples of Britain's world wide Empire.

4th Local Prize.—"The Queen's Gift Book," a book of stories, pictures and special articles by Britain's best writers; the proceeds from the sale of this book are for the benefit of disabled soldiers in England.

Note.—Unless the entries number six or more only first and second prizes will be awarded. Unless the entries number ten or more no fourth prize will be awarded.

The District Prizes.—The winner of the first prize at each local fair automatically becomes a competitor for the following District prizes.

1st District Prize.—The "Pathephone" is the name given to the fine big mahogany phonograph we offer as first prize. It will give you endless pleasure and entertainment for a lifetime. It has special reproducer attachments and needles, enabling you to play all kinds of flat disc records of no matter what make. The Pathephone reproduces band music, orchestra music, songs and funny pieces perfectly; with it goes a dozen of the famous Pathe records. Total value, $150.00.

2nd District Prize.—Set of Dickens' Works, 18 splendidly bound volumes with many illustrations. Among the books in the set are "Oliver Twist" and "Old Curiosity Shop." These are two of the most entrancing stories ever written.

3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes.—"Canuck" Bread mixers. This simple, yet well-made machine, takes the hard work out of bread making. Instead of laborious kneading of the old method, you just put in the ingredients, turn the handle, and the dough is thoroughly and more evenly mixed.

Read Carefully Conditions of Contest

Every girl may compete at the rural school fair in her district, whether or not she attends school, providing that her 12th birthday occurs before November 1st, 1917, or her 19th birthday does not occur before Nov. 1, 1917. One loaf of bread must be submitted baked in pan about 7 x 5 inches and 3 inches deep, and divided into two loaves, so that they may be separated at the fair. The loaf must be baked with Cream of the West Flour. One half will be judged at the fair. The other half of the prize loaf will be sent to Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph, to compete in the District Contests. The judging will be done by Miss M. A. Purdy, of the Department of Breadmaking and Flour Testing. The local contest at the fair will be conducted under the same rules as all the other regular contests at your fairs.

The Standard by which bread will be judged will be as follows:

1. Appearance of Loaf		15 marks
(a) Color	5 marks
(b) Texture of crust	5 marks
(c) Shape of loaf	5 marks
2. Texture of Crumb		40 marks
(a) Evenness	15 marks
(b) Silkiness	20 marks
(c) Color	5 marks
3. Flavor of Bread		45 marks
(a) Taste	25 marks
(b) Odor	20 marks

Important.—Each loaf must be accompanied by the part of the flour bag containing the face of the Old Miller, and an entry form must be signed by the girl and parents or guardian stating date of birth, P.O. address, and giving name of dealer from whom Cream of the West Flour was purchased. The form will state that the girl actually baked the loaf entered in the competition. The forms will be provided at the time of the fair. The decision of the judges is final. Not more than one entry may be made by each girl and not more than one local prize will be awarded to the same family.

Which District is Yours?—This list shows you which counties you compete against if you become a competitor for the District prizes:

District No. 1.—Counties of Glengarry, Stormont, Dundas, Grenville, Leeds, Frontenac, Lennox and Addington, Carleton, Lanark, Renfrew.

District No. 2.—Counties of Hastings, Prince Edward, Peterboro, Northumberland, Victoria, Durham.

District No. 3.—Counties of York, Ontario, Peel, Halton, Wentworth, Oxford, Brant, Waterloo (with a few fairs in Wellington and Perth).

District No. 4.—Counties of Welland, Haldimand, Norfolk, Elgin, Kent, Essex, Lambton, Middlesex (with a few fairs in Huron and Lincoln).

District No. 5.—Counties of Bruce, Grey, Dufferin, Simcoe, Districts of Muskoka, Parry Sound, Timiskaming, Algoma, Manitoulin.

THE RESULTS of the contests at the fair will be made known in the usual way as in the case of all the other regular contests. The District results will be announced as soon as possible after the conclusion of the Rural School Fairs in the Province.

DO NOT MISS THIS GREAT OPPORTUNITY. Every girl between 12 and 19 years should compete. What a splendid way to stir up increased interest in breadmaking! Get a supply of Cream of the West Flour at your dealers and practise using it as often as possible to increase the chances of winning. If your dealer cannot sell it to you, write to the Campbell Flour Mills Co., Ltd., Toronto, and we will promptly tell you the nearest place to get it.

NO COMPETITIONS IN COUNTIES NAMED BELOW: The competition is open to all parts of the Province where Rural School Fairs are held, except the Districts of Rainy River, Kenora and Thunder Bay. These districts are the only parts of the Province where school fairs are held by the Dept. of Agriculture in which this competition will not be a feature. There are no district-representatives of the Department of Agriculture in the Counties of Sudbury, Huron, Perth, Wellington, Haliburton, Prescott, Russell or Lincoln, and no rural school fairs are held in these Counties by the Dept. of Agriculture. There are, however, a few fairs held by local schools in Wellington, Perth, Huron and Lincoln, and these are included in the competition.

German Biologist Has Become Recent Convert To Faith in Militarism

THE famous German biologist and philosopher, Ernst Haeckel, in the second edition of his "History of Creation," published in 1870, just before the Franco-Prussian war, expressed himself severely with regard to the effect on civilization of what he termed "military selection," by which the finest examples of the youth of a nation are marked out for slaughter, while the unfit are exempt. It is pointed out by Professor Caullery, of the Paris Sorbonne, writing in The Revue Scientifique that in subsequent editions these passages were successively emasculated, and finally suppressed. Professor Caullery asserts that these changes marked the conversion of Haeckel to militarism. Whether or not this is true, the German-philosopher's former pacifist views and his subsequent unwillingness to father them are of considerable interest. Here is one of the strongest passages quoted by Professor Caullery:

"This infamous militarism, the cancer of contemporary Europe, has assumed an absolute and unprecedented preponderance since universal military service, a republican institution, has been united, forming the most monstrous of hybrids, with the permanent army that serves absolutist and dynastic ends."

PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

This passage, and others like it, were cut out in the third edition (1872), issued after Germany's victory. Following it, Haeckel goes on to express himself as follows in a passage that was left in the third edition, but had met its fate before the book reached the sixth:

"If any one should dare to propose to put to death at birth, as the Spartans and the redskins did, imperfect infants of whom a miserable existence could be surely predicted . . . our self-styled humanitarian civilization would rightly give a cry of indignation. But this same humanitarian civilization finds it quite natural that with each explosion of war . . . hundreds and thousands of the most vigorous youths should be exposed to the chances of battle! And why, I demand, is this flower of the population thus massacred? Generally, for ends that have not the slightest thing in common with the aims of humanity and which should be removed from the path of every really civilized people — in many cases for purely dynastic interests, which have nothing to do with the real happiness of the nations that have been hurled against each other."

Not only have these denunciations of militarism been cut out of the late editions, but in them Haeckel forbears entirely to criticise "military selection." Instead, he inserts a new passage condemnatory of what he calls "clerical selection," as "dangerous and devastating," acting through clerical celibacy and the influence of such institutions as the Spanish Inquisition, "which carefully eliminated all the noblest and best characters." Professor Caullery notes, as a matter of interest, that the edition containing this matter was issued (1875) at the time of Bismarck's Kulturkampf—his conflict with the Catholic Church; and he says:

"Haeckel—always a propagandist—thus went to the rescue of the Bismarckian policy of the day. The German intellectuals always love to put themselves at the service of the Government, and this is probably another example of the fact."

The Picture Show.

In a recent statement on the much-discussed question of the motion picture, Mr. Albert Chevalier brought out a point which is worthy of special attention. "The cinema, to-day," Mr. Chevalier said in effect, "is in much the same position as was the music hall twenty years ago; managers try to compose their program so as to suit all tastes, good or bad. As a consequence, many people will not, for half an hour's real pleasure, sit out a long series of items which jar or frankly displease." Who that has ever gone to a "picture show," in any part of the world, does not appreciate Mr. Chevalier's criticism?

Lesson VIII.—Third Quarte
Aug. 19, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL S

Text of the Lesson, II Chron. xx
33—Memory Verse, 31—Golde
Ps. cxix, 18—Commentary P
by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

The first verse of our lesson, wi the marginal reading, might indicat that the book they found was an orig inal copy by the hand of Moses, but i might have been another copy, accord ing to Deut. xvii, 18, 19; II Kings xi, 12
Josh. i, 8. It is sufficient to know tha it was the Book of the Law of th
Lord, which, when it was read to th king, caused him to rend his clot and send to Huldah, the prophetess, inquire of the Lord, through her, wh they should do (xix, 22). This was the eighteenth year of his reign (xxx 8; xxxv, 19), and Jeremiah began prophesy when thirteen. Therefore w send to Huldah instead of to Jeremi
Perhaps because Huldah was there
Jerusalem and Jeremiah was pr ably at Anathoth (II Kings xxii, 14; J i, 1). It is interesting to notice in t connection the honor placed upon su women as Huldah and Deborah Hannah and others and to remem that Mary of Bethany knew the L better in many ways than any of t other women or even than Peter a John. Some women seem to ha keener eyes and ears and a more op heart for God than most men.

I often ask God to give me guida through my dear wife, who walks humbly with Him; then all goes we Huldah had a good message for J siah, because of his humility and te der heart, when he heard the words the Lord, for, although God is the hi and lofty one who inhabiteth eternit whose name is holy, He has regard the contrite and humble spirit th trembles at His word (Isa. lvii, lxvi, 2). Josiah called together all people of Jerusalem, priests and vites, and all the inhabitants, gr and small, and he read in their all the words of the book of the nant that was found in the ho the Lord, and he promised with heart and with all his soul to p the words of the covenant and all present to stand to it. And days of Josiah they departed not following the Lord God of the there (verses 29-33).

The expression "with all his and with all his soul" (verse minds me of the only thing that remember reading that God a will do assuredly with His who and with His whole soul, and place Israel in their own land joice over them to do them goo xxxii, 41). According to Luke x 16, 29, 30, this will be at the the final fulfillment of the Pa for the Passover marked the bi the nation, and the great fulf will be when they shall have th generation, never to be broken up (Matt. xix, 28; Acts iii, 21). It w the year that the book of the law found (xxxiv, 8; xxxv, 19), that siah caused to be kept the great Passover in the history of Israel si the days of Samuel the prophet (xxx 18; II Kings xxiii, 22). It was writte of Hezekiah that there was no lik before him or after him who trusted in the Lord, his God, as he did, but it is written of Josiah that there was no king either before or after him who turned to the Lord with all his heart and with all his soul and with all his might as he did (II Kings xviii, 5; xxiii, 25).

Hezekiah excelled in one way and Josiah in another, but the Lord noted each fully. We are reminded of the way the saints are spoken of by Paul—some succored others, some laid down their own necks for Paul's sake, some were helpers, some labored an some labored much, some were i Christ before him (Rom. xvi)—and th it will be at the judgment seat
Christ, all service will be remember and all manner of service and the sp cial zeal of each one, and each will r ceive his own reward according to h own labor (I Cor. iii, 8). In connectio with the passover always remembe that it was the blood on the door tha made the firstborn safe in that hous
not the blood and something else, bu
God said, "When I see the blood I w pass over you" (Ex. xii, 13). It was t be a lamb without blemish, and Chri our passover is the Lamb witho blemish and without spot (Ex. xii, 5; Cor. v, 7; I Pet. i, 19). The flesh of th lamb was to be roasted with fire a eaten with unleavened bread and bi ter herbs (Ex. xii, 8), suggesting His sufferings and our fellowship with Him in sufferings, and as there was no leaven or evil in Him so we who are redeemed by His blood must put away all evil, as it is written, "Be ye holy, for I am holy." Eating the lamb did not add to, nor increase their safety, but indicated fellowship, as He said,
"He that eateth me shall live by me"
(John vi, 57). If the firstborn, being under the blood that night, could not eat a bite of the lamb because of nerv ousness or for any other reason that did not at all affect their safety.
Whether it was the house of an Israel ite or an Egyptian on which the blood was there could be no death under that blood. The lamb was never too small for the household, but if the household was too little for the lamb they were to share it with their neighbors (Ex. xii, 4). And in the sight of God is not our neighbor any one with whom we can share the lamb, whether in foreign lands or on the same street with us!

Room For Improvement

Durham, Hanover, and Walkerton certainly cannot boast of the condition of the roads leading into the towns, or even the business thoroughfares. We don't know that any one of the towns is better or worse than the other, but we think there is an exceptionally good opportunity for improvement, with little or no chance of their getting any worse.—Durham Chronicle.

Looking for Information.

Members of Hanover Council were in town last Thursday getting information about our hydro system as Hanover is installing the great white light. Advertising!

in its highest sense is the creation of a new want and providing the means with which to apply that want. The aim of Advertising is not to spread the name of a firm so much as to get business for that firm. The ad. that counts is the one that makes the luxuries of today the necessities of tomorrow. A great many people advertise as they give to charity—merely to get rid of a solicitor. Then the advertiser says it doesn't pay and when done in that spirit it does not. Advertisers must put brain and selling force into their their copy, and when this is done they find that advertising is not an expense, but the finest kind of an investment. —S. C. Dobbs, past president Associated Advertising Clubs of America.

Destroyed by Cyclone

In a recent letter received by Mrs. A. S. Royce from her sister, Mrs. H. R. Tolton of Oak Lake, Man., she described the complete wrecking of their large barn by a cyclone, which not only carried the building off the foundation but destroyed the foundation itself. Pieces of the building were picked up 300 yards away. Mr. Tolton is the eldest son of Mr. James Tolton, Walkerton and is one of the most prominent farmers in Oak Lake.

A Quiet Wedding

Miss Thelma Ruth Jones, youngest daughter of Mrs. Grif. Jones, and Mr. Calvin Ingles Clubb of Whitechurch, were quietly married at the Methodist Parsonage at six o'clock, Saturday evening, Aug. 4th, by Rev. C. W. Cosens. The bride looked pretty in blue silk crepe de chine and becoming hat. Mrs. James Bell and Mr. Paul Jones were the attendants. Afterwards a dainty luncheon was served at the home of the bride's mother, only the immediate families being present. After spending their honeymoon at Toronto and Niagara Falls, Mr. and Mrs. Clubb will make their home at Parry Sound where Mr. Clubb has a good position.

Can't Beat These Oats

The finest sample of oats we have seen was brought to this office last week by Mr. Dan Madden of Chepstow. The stalks were about 6ft long, with a heavy head 21 inches deep. They are the famous O. A. C. No. 72 variety. Mr. Madden has a field of about ten acres and should have a very heavy yield.

Boys Are Workers.

Two Walkerton lads, Walt. Patterson and Frank Scherrer went to Aylmer last week for some holidays. Finding the haying in full swing and help impossible to get they showed the good stuff they are made of by taking off their coats and going to work on the farm of Wm. Patterson sr. Before they quit the two boys cut and teamed to the barn no less than 40 tons of hay. Considering that neither boy had ever worked a mower or pitched hay before this is certainly "some" record.

Big Day's Run

Inspector John McCool had an auto run one day last week which should pretty nearly constitute a record day's trip for Walkerton. Mr. McCool undertook to take two nieces by auto to London where they were to catch the train for their home at Tyre, Mich. An unfortunate blowout and a puncture caused delay, and on finding the train had left London, Mr. McCool drove through from London to Sarnia, where the young ladies were able to make their connection. Mr. McCool then motored back to Walkerton, arriving here early in the evening after a 308 mile trip during the day.

THE VICTORIA CROSS

At Flanders plain the Fusiliers were lined up on parade,
"Step forward, Sergeant Murphy," the Colonel sharply said,
"For gallantry at Ypres, where you saved your men from loss,
His Majesty commands to confer this honored cross."
"Och, Colonel, dear, yes, sir, I mean, there must be some mistake,
I only did me duty when we had those lines to break.
But I was not at Epray, sir—I swear by Moses' pipers,
My company was stationed just beyan the town of Wipers"

Women's Good Work.

Two of the largest and best gardens at the South end of the town are those of Mrs. Joseph Wallace and Mrs. Hugh Threndyle. While their husbands are Overseas, these courageous women are doing their bit at home in a way that is a shining example to others.

Minister Hits Out

"Our Canadians at the Front are spoken of throughout the world as lions," said Rev. C. W. Cosens at the Methodist Church on Sunday morning, "but our members of Parliament at Ottawa have acted like a parcel of donkeys. When I read of what our boys are doing at the Front, it makes me very proud, but when I look at what we are doing at home, it makes me ashamed to call myself a Canadian." The speaker went on to say that Canada should have had a coalition gov't. and conscription long ago. Conscription was nothing new, he said. They had it in the Napoleonic wars and in the Civil War across the line.

Parcel Delivery Needed

In a good many towns, the merchants have handed over the delivery of parcels to a general parcel delivery, which is able to handle the parcels at less cost than formerly, and with greater satisfaction to the customers. Delivery is made at certain hours three or four times a day and the housewife knows in advance to within a few minutes when the goods will arrive. When help is as scarce as it is at present, and the cost of delivery constantly rising, we believe the merchants of Walkerton would find it to their advantage to organize a delivery system. The public would appreciate it too, for after all the high cost of delivering goods has to be paid by the customers.

The Hon. D. Marshall and Mrs. Marshall of Olds, Alberta, and their nephew, Gordon McNally, son of Dr. McNally of Guelph, were visitors of Mr. and Mrs. D. McKechnie Monday evening on their way from Dobbington to Exeter. Mr. Marshall expects a bumper crop in Alberta. He will attend and be one of the speakers at the association at the Illinois State Fair at Chicago-Iowa State Fair at Des Moines and the Toronto Exhibition before returning home. He is buying a number of thoroughbred cattle for his big farm at Olds.

Salary Raised $200

The Quarterly Official Board of the Methodist Church has shown its appreciation of the services of Rev. C. W. Cosens, as well as recognizing the increased cost of living, by increasing his salary from $1,000 to $1,200.

Auct'n Sale

An auction sale of Household Furniture, One-Horse Implements, good Driver, Buggy etc., will be held at Alex. Gordon's residence, Yonge St., Walkerton, on Saturday next, at 1 p.m. Alex. Gordon, prop., D. Cantin, auctioneer.

Herscht—Seiling

Miss Mabel Seiling, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Seiling of Walkerton, was united in marriage at Alsask, Sask on Wednesday, August 15th, to Mr. Harry Herscht, a prosperous young farmer of Alsask, and son of Mr. Geo. Herscht, formerly of Walkerton but now of Alsask.

Quarantined For Diphtheria

Letters from boys of the 160th Batt'n received this week state that the Battalion has been quarantined for diphtheria. The rainy season is starting again and the Battalion expects soon to move into new quarters. This would seem to indicate that the Battalion will spend another winter in England.

County Bowling Trophy

Representatives of the thirteen bowling Clubs of Bruce County will meet at Cargill today to make arrangements for a Bruce County Trophy to be competed for in the County. Since the Bowman Trophy was taken off to Toronto by the Queen City Club, there is now no trophy for a local competition.

Preliminary Trial Today

Martin Hanson, the Cargill farmer, who is charged with setting fire to his wife's barn, will appear before Magistrate James Tolton for preliminary trial at the Town Hall at 2 o'clock today. Crown Attorney Dixon will be assisted in the prosecution by David Robertson K. C. Hanson will be defended by Barrister O. E. Klein.

The Bowling Tourney.

Everything is in readiness for the Bowling Tourney here on Labor Day. The green is in fine shape and all that is needed is good weather to ensure the success of the big meet. Hanover will send 6 rinks, Durham 3 rinks and several other clubs have already expressed the intention of being represented. The local club expects to have 7 rinks of players on the job.

Removing To Saskatoon.

Mr. and Mrs. Alex. Gordon and family are leaving shortly to make their home at Saskatoon where Mr. Gordon's parents and several brothers, formerly of this town, now reside. Two or three business openings present themselves at Saskatoon and Alex. expects to go into business of some kind. The best wishes of their many Walkerton friends go with them to their new home.

Want to be Nurses

No less than six Walkerton young ladies have been accepted as probationers at various hospitals and are leaving shortly to train as nurses. They are: Miss Pauline Clapp (Sick Children's Hospital, Toronto), Miss Nettie [illegible] (St. Joseph's, Hamilton), Miss Ruth Rogers (Kitchener & Waterloo Hospital), Miss Blanche Wingefelder (Detroit Hospital), Miss Ruth Kenny (Western Hospital, Toronto).

No Pension in Sight

We understand that one of the Walkerton boys who was invalided home from France lately, has received his discharge from the army with his pay cut off but no pension in sight. As he has not sufficiently recovered from his disability to go to work, his position is not an enviable one. Instances of this kind multiplying on all sides, would seem to indicate that the authorities are making a poor fist of looking after the interests of our returned soldiers. If the government interprets the temper of the public rightly in regard to the handling of such cases it will very soon make a radical change.

D. C. M. Received Here

The Distinguished Conduct Medal recently won by Corp. Ed. Eidt has been sent home for safe keeping to members of the family and was received here by mail yesterday. It is a handsome silver piece nearly the size of the American silver dollar. On one side appear the words "For Distinguished Conduct in the Field". The reverse side bears the head of King George V. Cpl. Eidt's name, number, and battalion are engraved on the edge of the medal. While the intrinsic value is a mere nothing, the D. C. M. next to the V. C. is the most highly prized decoration that any soldier in the British Empire can win.

Delivery Boy wanted

Delivery boy wanted.—Apply to John H. Appel.

Hanover Boy Killed

Lieut. Adams, a popular Hanover officer, was reported killed in action, Saturday.

Stan Johnston Wounded

Pte. Stan Johnston, nephew of Mayor Johnston, was reported wounded in Wednesday's Casualty lists. Stan enlisted at Toronto with the Canadian Buffs. He is a son of Mr. David Johnston of Dunkeld.

Patriotic Lawn Social

A lawn social will be held at the home of Mr. Thos. Cunningham, Brant, on Thursday, August 30th. A good program will be provided, lunch free, admission 25 and 15 cents. Proceeds go to buy comforts for the soldiers.

Death of Jimmie Wilson.

"Jimmie" Wilson, well-known around Walkerton, passed away at the Bruce County Hospital on Sunday in his 66th year, after a serious illness with pneumonia. He was a native of Brant and had been employed by farmers around here all his life. He was honest and hardworking but latterly had been mentally and physically helpless.

Died at Gaol

Richard Thomas Jones, an old man who had been in the County Gaol since May 14th for vagrancy, passed away on Friday night in his 73rd year after a short illness. He came here from Bruce Township but has no relatives as far as is known. The Coroner, Dr. Porter, held an inquest Friday night, with Mr. J. M. White as foreman. The jury brought in a verdict of death from natural causes.

Bowlers At Durham and Hanover.

Two rinks of Walkerton bowlers went over to Durham on Monday afternoon for a friendly game, playing in the evening at Hanover. At Durham Lay's rink was 2 down and McConnell's was 1 up on the play. The Walkerton men were:—H. M. Lay, skip, Major Henderson, N. Hixon, C. H. Rogers; E. McConnell, skip, F. G. Eidt, J. T. Clancy, N. M. Player.

Back From Overseas

Sergt. Rupert Etherton arrived home from Overseas on Friday night and was given a warm welcome home by a crowd of citizens at the station. Mayor Johnston and Mr. John Rowland were the first to greet him as he stepped off the train. Rupert went over with the 71st Batt'n but had poor health which necessitated his being invalided home. His father went over last year with the 147th Grey Batt'n and is now doing his bit on the battlefields of France.

Broke Into House.

Two Walkerton youths entered the house of Mr. Alex. [illegible] last Sunday afternoon during the family's absence and helped themselves to eatables and other articles. The young fellows were caught red-handed by a neighbor's boys who were on the lookout as the place had been entered before two weeks ago when the family were away. As soon as the young culprits saw they were caught they "beat it" and have not yet been located. The last trace of them is at Clifford, but it is expected they will be rounded up and brought back to Walkerton for trial in a day or two.

Respected Pioneer Gone

Death claimed, another pioneer resident of this community in the person of Mrs. Fred. Cline sr. who passed away at her home opposite the County Hospital on Friday morning in her 84th year. Mrs. Cline had been poorly for about three months, her forces gradually weakening from the effect of old age. Coming from the Old Country at the age of 20, to meet her intended husband, Mrs. Cline was married at Buffalo in 1852. For three years Mr. and Mrs. Cline lived at Jordan near Grimsby, and later at Bethany, in Marysborough Tp. It is about fifty years ago since they settled in Brant at Cline's Corners, named after Mr. Cline. There the deceased made her home for nearly half a century, coming to Walkerton with her daughter a year ago last November. Her husband predeceased her eleven years ago. Mrs. Cline was a kind-hearted motherly body, her hospitality was proverbial. She was loath to leave the old neighborhood in old age but distance did not deter the old friends and neighbors from visiting her hospitable fireside frequently. The surviving family are:—E. H. Cline of Oak River, Man; Mrs. Rausch, Detroit; Isaac, Iowa; Henry, Detroit; Fred on the homestead at Cline's Corners. Miss Jennie at home. A large concourse of old friends from town and country were present at the funeral on Sunday to pay their last respects to the departed. Rev. Mr. Robertson, who is supplying at the Knox Church for the holidays, conducted the service.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

WHEN you come to look squarely at the whole scheme of life you can find a lot of places for the practice of economy, says the Port Rowan News. But please don't ask the women to cut their skirts any shorter.

THE period of political turmoil in Canada should be brought to an end as quickly as possible. If there is to be an election it should not be held off any longer than is necessary. When it is over the people can get back to other things that require attention.

THE U. S. Liberty Loan was floated by the Banks without charge. This sort of free patriotic service is not popular in Canada. On the loan which Sir Thomas White recently negotiated in the United States the Bank of Montreal received $1,750,000 commission for assisting the Minister.

WHEN will the war end? The answer of Lloyd George that "we should continue to fight for the great goal of international justice, so that never again shall brute force sit on the throne of justice, nor barbaric strength wield the sceptre of right," was an appropriate one. It means much fighting yet.

IT is all very well to urge economy of food, but there should be some guarantee that the people when they do without bacon and other things are not playing into the hands of the cold-storage concerns. The law of supply and demand is dislocated in war-time, and unless a close watch is kept upon prices the profiteers will make the people pay as much for a meatless meal as for the full dinner of the days of plenty. What is Mr. Hanna doing to provide against this?

THE worst mischief-makers in Canada are the tory papers that make insulting comments on the public life and character of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the people of Quebec. For Canada's Grand Old Man to differ on a question of principle with a large section of the country is his privilege and every right-thinking Canadian knows that he does it conscientiously. History will give the old Chieftain his rightful place as the outstanding Canadian of his day and generation.

THE WEST with its 57 members will be a factor of ever increasing importance in the Parliament of Canada. Westerners are proverbially lacking in dyed-in-the-woolism in politics. Party affiliations out in the new country are not so strong as in the East. The result should be that the traditional parties will not have such a strangle-hold on the allegiance of their supporters in future. And it will be a good thing for Canada. This unswerving allegiance to party is the bane of party government. The party relies on the votes and support of its followers through good and evil report and becomes callous and indifferent to the public weal. Selfish politicians use the party loyalty for self exploitation and self aggrandizement. If we see men on both sides being sent to Ottawa who are absolutely lacking in the essentials of statesmanship, we can charge it up to our deep-rooted political prejudices.

THE MacKenzie and Mann bill ought to go over to a new parliament, which would have the time and the ability to consider justly what ought to be done, says the Farmers Weekly Sun. Above all, a new parliament would be free of the influence of the notorious lobby, which these promoters have long maintained in Ottawa. The political activities of the financial backers of MacKenzie and Mann in support of the government are such as to raise in the public mind a doubt, at least, of its complete devotion to the public interest. The bill ought to go over to a new parliament because its subject and its consequences are not easily understood. Parliament flounders in the debate. It grasps easily enough the startling proposal to pay the attributed value of the 60 millions of stock, but the accounts presented, the relations of creditors and governments and, as we have said, the consequences are not understood. The alternative remedies of liquidation, receivership and consolidation with other roads have not been thought out. Besides, more will be known, six months or a year hence, of the prospects of the C. N. R. and of what the country may safely undertake.

MR. JOSEPH LAWSON of Guelph who was in town last Wednesday says that the biggest man in Canada so far as ability to fill a Dominion cabinet is concerned, has not even been mentioned publicly for a place in a war cabinet. He referred to Mr. Thomas Bradshaw, the financial expert, who left commercial life last year to take the treasurership of the City of Toronto. Mr. Bradshaw is a man of high character, proven ability, and Mr. Lawson who knows him quite well, is emphatically of the opinion that there is no better man in all Canada to sit in the Cabinet during the War crisis.

TORONTO Saturday Night has dug up some old court records that go a long way towards supporting Commissioner O'Connor's statements regarding bacon profits. The following is from Saturday Night: "An interesting sidelight on the past profits of the Wm. Davies Company is obtainable owing to there being court records. Some years ago there was a friendly action at law, brought by the executors of the estate of Mrs. Wm. Davies against several interested parties. As a result it was shown that the capital stock of the company was then valued at from three to four hundred dollars per share (par value $100) and that the dividends over a period of fourteen years, 1893 to 1906, inclusive, ranged from 15 to 120 per cent, the average over the entire period being a little over 50 per cent, which seems enough under the circumstances. A table was placed in evidence, showing the dividends which the stock paid during these fourteen years to be:—For the year ending March 31, 1893, 65 per cent; 1894, 38 per cent; 1895, 40 per cent; 1896, 45 per cent; 1897, 100 per cent; 1898, 120 per cent; 1899, 82 per cent; 1900, 69 per cent; 1901, 27½ per cent; 1902, 27½ per cent; 1903, 15 per cent; 1904, 35 per cent; 1905, 11 per cent; 1906, 25 per cent.

GRAVE MARKED BY CROSS

Walkerton Boys of Trench Mortar Battery Write Thoughtful Letter to Parents of Their Chum, Pte. Alvin Wilton.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Wilton had a thoughtful letter from the Walkerton boys of the 10th Trench Mortar Battery, to which their son Alvin belonged, which they very much appreciate.

Somewhere In France,
July 18, 1917.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilton:—

This is the middle of July, almost a year since we arrived in France, and nearly seven months since Alvin lost his life.

We took advantage of an opportunity to order crosses for the graves of the boys buried on Vimy Ridge, and today received word that the crosses had been completed, so we Walkerton boys and a couple more comrades took them up on the Ridge and erected them over their graves—five of them, a cross over the grave of each boy who was buried there. Alvin, two boys from Alberta, one from Winnipeg and one from Galt.

They are plain, white crosses, with the figure of a green maple leaf at the top and the names and dates of their deaths neatly inscribed.

In Memory of
PTE. A. F. WILTON
127,530
10th T. M. B., 58th Batt'n
Killed in Action Jan. 5, 1917.

Alvin is one of the thousands of boys who laid down their lives in holding that ridge against Germany. French, British and Canadian armies in succession, held it for three years until finally on the 9th of April Canadian and British troops drove the Germans down over the east slopes, and back to the line they now hold, a few miles beyond the ridge.

From where the boys are buried on "Hill 145", on the crest of the ridge, we can see a great expanse of country, the ruined town of Souchez directly below us and the broken church spire of Albain Ste Nazarre away along the valley. What we could see the enemy could also see, and could observe the movements of troops anywhere in the valley. But they have lost this strong position now and are back where we're more on a level with them.

The French people who will return to the towns near there to rebuild their ruined homes, will hold the spot where the boys are buried as a sacred place, and will take good care of the graves.

The boys are all well, and enjoying a rest from the line, in a town where there are no shell holes and where the houses aren't all blown to pieces by German shells. It will soon be autumn again, and the grain in many places has been already harvested.

When we come home, which we hope won't be very long now, will be able to tell you all about it.

Yours in sympathy

Cpl. E. G. Eidt, Pte. Roy A. Oberle, Pte. L. McGirr (Durham), Pte. C. A. Cunningham, Cpl. G. Baird (Galt), Sergt. T. C. Wilhelm.

Brazil Has Wealth and Power

OF the ten republics of South America there is one which surpasses any of the others in area, population, and resources. This is Brazil, which also differs from its neighbors in origin. While the other South American states were originally colonies of Spain, Brazil owed its settlement to Portuguese adventurers. It was first discovered by Vicente Pinzon, one of the companions of Columbus. No settlement took place, however, the region being east of the line of demarcation agreed upon by commissioners of Spain and Portugal in June, 1494. In the year 1500 a Portuguese commander, Pedro Alvares Cabral, on his way to the East round the Cape of Good Hope, was driven far out of his course by adverse weather, until finally he reached the Brazilian coast. Cabral having landed, Mass was celebrated on Easter Day, 1500, a cross was erected and the country was declared to be a dependency of the Portuguese Crown. During the ensuing fifty years settlements, called captaincies, were made along the Atlantic coast from the mouth of the Amazon to the mouth of the La Plata. It was found necessary to provide for the common defence to establish a central government, and Thome de Souza was appointed the first governor general. In 1552 the first bishop of Brazil arrived. The college of St. Paulo was founded and placed in charge of Jesuit professors. In 1578 began a period of humiliation for Portugal when Philip II. of Spain acquired the crown and the subordination lasted until 1640. During the interval Brazil was several times assailed by hostile expeditions. The Dutch alone succeeded in making good their foothold. When the House of Braganza had wrested the crown from Spain the new dynasty resolved to imitate the policy of the Dutch in order to oust them from the land which they had usurped. A commercial company was established at Lisbon similar to that which had its headquarters at Amsterdam. This company was authorized to defend Brazil from its enemies. It sent out a fleet and a land force and engaged in a stubborn conflict with the intruders which ended in the defeat of the Dutch and their exclusion from Brazilian territory. For half a century afterwards the Portuguese colonists enjoyed immunity from hostile attack. The discovery of gold and diamonds had the result of withdrawing laborers from the sugar industry in which Brazil had won the pre-eminence. The revolution in North America had an echo in Brazil when some of the colonists of Minas attempted to cast off the Portuguese yoke. The French Revolution affected the fortunes of Brazil still more profoundly. Threat of invasion from France induced the prince regent (afterwards King John VI.) to cross the ocean, with the queen, the royal family and the great officers of state. On the 16th of January, 1815, Brazil was constituted a kingdom. On the 26th of April 1821, King John returned to Europe leaving the problem of Brazil to be solved by his son, Dom Pedro. On the 7th of September, 1822, Dom Pedro declared Brazil independent, and a few weeks later became constitutional Emperor. In 1831 he resigned in favor of his infant son, Dom Pedro II. The young Emperor who was to be known as one of the most enlightened princes of his time, attained his majority on the 23rd of July, 1840, and held the sceptre of a constitutional sovereign until November 15, 1889.

The revolution which closed the reign of Dom Pedro, was without bloodshed. The imperial regime was succeeded by a constitution based mainly on that of the United States. Dom Pedro's successor as ruler of Brazil, was Marshal Deodoro da Fonseca. Brazil is a country of enormous extent, stretching in one direction 4,000 miles, and in another 2,500, and having an area of nearly three million and a quarter of square miles. It consists of twenty states, the population of which ranges from four and a half millions to less than a quarter million. There are a good many residents in Brazil of foreign birth—Italians, Germans, Portuguese, Poles, French, and British. Just at present the Germans are attracting most attention. They are said to number about 350,000. Mr. W. S. Barclay, who visited Southern Brazil some twelve years ago, failed to detect any general desire, on the part of the German settlers to substitute the German eagle for the flag of their adopted country, but admits that ill advised propaganda may have led some of them astray. The German emigration to Brazil took place for the most part in the sixties or early seventies of the nineteenth century. That of the Poles and Italians was of a later date.

The resources of Brazil are varied and great in keeping with its vast extent. They include coffee, rubber, rice, sugar, tobacco, cotton, cacao, Brazil nuts, diamonds, emeralds, sapphires, garnets, and other precious stones, gold, sulphur, bitumen, coal, copper, quicksilver, galena, and lead. It is on her enormous coffee crop that Brazil depends for her income from overseas. Three-quarters of the world's coffee comes from Brazil. Two-thirds of the product is raised in the State of San Paulo. The forests of Brazil are virtually boundless. That of Matto Grosso is a million square miles in extent. The condor, the cayman, the tarpon, the jaguar, the guanaco, the vampire-bat, the acallum, the bird-killing spider, these are a few of the forms of animal life that are met with in Brazil. As for the vegetable life, its variety is a world without end.

He was not long alone. Noiselessly he double doors opened, and Jaimihr Khan entered. Woodhouse sprang to meet him where he stood poised for ight just inside the doors.

"Yes; the general's suspicions are all oused again."

"When this war is over, if I am alive," he was saying rapturously, "may I come to America for you? Will you—wait?"

"Perhaps."

The door to General Crandall's room opened. They sprang apart just as Crandall and Bishop entered the library. The former was not blind to the situation. He darted a swift glance into the girl's face and read much there.

"Ready, captain?" Bishop chirped, affecting not to notice the momentary confusion of the man and the girl.

Woodhouse gave Jane's hand a lingering clasp. Mutely his eyes adjured her to remember her plighted troth. In another minute he was gone.

The general and his guest were alone. Jane Gerson was bidding him good night when he interrupted, somewhat gruffly:

"Well, young woman, have you made up your mind? Do you sail in the morning or not?"

"I made up my mind to that long ago," she answered briskly. "Of course I sail."

"Then you're going to tell me what I want to know. Sensible girl!" He rubbed his hands in satisfaction.

"What is it you want to know, General Crandall?" This almost carelessly from her.

"When did you meet Woodhouse before—and where?"

"How did you know I met him before?" She attempted to parry, but Crandall cut her short with a gesture of impatience.

"Please don't try that tack again. Answer those two questions and you sail in the morning."

Jane Gerson's eyes grew hard, and she lifted her chin in defiance.

"And if I refuse"—

"Why should you?" Crandall affected surprise not altogether unfelt.

"No matter. I do!" The challenge came crisp and sharp cut as a new blade. Gibraltar's governor lost his temper instanter. His face purpled.

"And I know why!" he rasped. "He's got round you—made love to you—tricked you! I'd swear he was kissing you just the minute I came in here. The cad! Good Lord, girl, can't you see how he's using you?"

"I'm afraid I can't."

Crandall advanced toward her, shaking a menacing finger at her.

"Let me tell you something, young woman: He's at the end of his rope—done for! No use for you to stand up for him longer. He's under guard tonight, and a woman named Joseph his accomplice—or maybe his dupe—already under arrest, and tomorrow, when we examine her, she'll reveal his whole rotten scheme or have to stand against a wall with him. Come, now! Throw him over. Don't risk your job, as you call it, for a German spy who's tricked you—made a fool of you. Why"—

"General Crandall!" Her face was white, and her eyes glowed with anger.

"I—I beg your pardon, Miss Gerson," he mumbled. "I am exasperated. A fine girl like you—to throw away all your hopes and ambitions for a spy—and a bounder! Can't you see you're wrong?"

"General Crandall, some time—I hope it will be soon—you will apologize to me and to Captain Woodhouse for what you are saying tonight." Her hands clinched into fists, whereupon the knuckles showed white. The poise of her head, held a little forward, was all combative.

"Then you won't tell me what I want to know?" He could not but read the defiance in the girl's pose.

"I will tell you nothing but goodby!"

"No, by gad, you won't! I can be stubborn too. You shan't sail on the Saxonia in the morning. Understand?"

"Oh, shan't I? Who will dare stop me?"

"I will, Miss Gerson. I have plenty of right—and the power too."

"I'll ask you to tell that to my consul on the deck at 5 tomorrow morning. Until then, General Crandall, au revoir!"

The door of the guest room shut with a spiteful slam upon the master of Gibraltar, leaving him to nurse a grievance on the knees of wrath.

CHAPTER XX.

The Trap Is Sprung.

JOSEPH ALMER and Captain Woodhouse sat in the darkened and heavily blinded office-reception room of the Hotel Splendide. All the hotel had long since been put to bed, and the silence in the rambling house was audible. The hands of the Dutch clock on the wall were pointing to the hour of 3:30.

Strain was on both the men. They spoke in monosyllables and only occasionally. Almer's hand went out from time to time to lift a squat bottle of brandy from the table between them and pour a tiny glass brimful; he quaffed with a sucking noise. Woodhouse did not drink.

"It is 3:30," the latter fretted, with an eye on the mottled clock dial.

"He will come," Almer assured. A long pause.

"This man Jaimihr—he is thoroughly dependable?" The man in uniform put the question with petulant brusqueness.

"It is his passion—what we are to do tonight—something he has lived for—his religion. Nothing except judgment day could— Hah!"

The sharp chirp of a telephone bell, a dagger of sound in the silence, broke Almer's speech. He bounded to his feet, but not so quickly as Woodhouse, who was across the room in a single stride and had the receiver to his ear.

"Well, well! Yes, this is the one you name." Woodhouse turned to Almer, and his lips framed the word Jaimihr. "Yes, yes; all is well—and waiting. Bishop? He is beyond interference—coming down the Rock—I did the work silently. What's that?" Woodhouse's face was tensed in strain; his right hand went to a breast pocket and brought out a pencil. With it he began making memoranda on the face of a calendar by his side.

"Seven turns—ah, yes—four to the left—correct." His writing hand was moving swiftly. "Press one to the right. Good! I have it and am off at once. Goodby!"

Woodhouse finished a line of script on the calendar face and hung up the receiver. He carefully tore the written notes from the calendar and put them into his pocket.

"Jaimihr says he has work to do at Government House and cannot come down." Woodhouse turned to Almer and explained in rapid sentences. "But he's given me the combination—to Room D—over the wire, and now I'm off!"

Almer was all excitement now. He hovered lovingly about Woodhouse, patting him on the shoulder, giving him his helmet, mothering him with little cooing noises.

"Speed quickly, 1932! Up the Rock to the signal tower, 1932, to do the deed that will boom around the world. The switches—one pull, my brother, and the fatherland is saved to triumph over her enemies, victorious!"

"Right, Almer!" Woodhouse was moving toward the door. "In eight minutes history will be made. The minute you hear the blast start for Spain. I will try to escape, but I doubt"—

A knock came at the barred front door—one knock, followed by three. Both men were transfixed. Almer, first to recover his calmness, motioned Woodhouse through the door to the dining room. When his companion had disappeared he stepped to the door and cautiously asked, "Who knocks?"

An answer came that caused him to shoot back the bolts and thrust out his head. A message was hurriedly whispered into his ear. The Splendide's proprietor withdrew his head and slipped the bolt home again. His face was as a thundercloud as he summoned Woodhouse. His breath came in wheezy gasps.

"My Arab boy comes to the door just now to tell me of Louisa's fate. She has been arrested," he said.

"Come, Almer! I am going to the signal tower. There is still time for us to strike."

Out on to Waterport street leaped Woodhouse, and the door closed behind him.

Jane Gerson, tossing on her pillows, heard the mellow bell of a clock somewhere in the dark and silent house strike 3. This was the fifth time she had counted the measured strokes of that bell as she lay, wide eyed, in the guest chamber's canopied bed. An eternity had passed since the dinner guests' departure. Her mind was racing like some engine gone wild, and sleep was impossible. Over and over again she had conned the events of the evening, always to come at the end against the impasse of General Crandall's blunt denial, "You shan't sail in the morning." In her extremity she had even considered flight by stealth—the scaling of walls perhaps, and a groping through dark streets to the wharf, there to smuggle herself somehow on a tender and so gain the Saxonia. But her precious gowns! They still reposed in their bulky hampers here in Government House. To escape and leave them behind would be worse than futile. The governor's fiat seemed absolute.

Urged by the impulse of sheer necessity to be doing something—the bed had become a rack—the girl rose, lit a taper and began to dress herself, moving noiselessly. She even packed her traveling bag to the last inch and locked it. Then she sat on the edge of the bed, hands helplessly folded in her lap. What to do next? Was she any better off dressed than thrashing in the bed? Her yearning called up a picture of the Saxonia, which must ere this be at her anchorage, since the consul said she was due at 2. In three short hours tenders would puff alongside, a happy procession of refugees climb the gangway, among them the Shermans and Willy Kimball, bound for their Kewanee, the captain on the bridge would give an order, winches would puff, the anchor heave from the mud, the big boat's prow slowly turn westward, oceanward, toward New York! And she, a prisoner caught by the mischance of war's great mystery, would have to watch that diminishing column of smoke fade against the morning's blue—disappear.

Inspiration seized her. It would be something just to see the Saxonia, now lying amid the grim monsters of the war fleet. From the balcony of the library, just outside the door of her room, she could search the darkness of the harbor for the prickly rows of lights marking the merchant ship from her darker neighbors. The general's marine glasses lay on his desk, she remembered. To steal out to the balcony, sweep the harbor with the glasses and at last hit on the ship of deliverance—for all but her—to do this would be better than counting the hours alone. She softly opened the door of her room. Beyond lay the dim distances of the library suddenly become vast as an amphitheater; in the thin light filtering through the curtains screening the balcony appeared the lumpy masses of furniture and vague outlines of walls and doors. She closed the door behind her and stood trembling—this was somehow like burglary, she felt—at least it had the thrill of burglary.

The girl tiptoed around a high backed chair, groped her way to the general's desk and fumbled there. Her hand fell upon the double tubes of the binoculars. She picked them up, parted the curtains and stepped through the opened glass doors to the balcony. Not a sound anywhere but the faint clack and cackle of cargo hoists down in the harbor. Jane put the glasses to her eyes and began to sweep the light pointed vista below the cliff. Scores of pin prick beams of radiance marked the fleet where it choked the roadstead—red and white beetles' eyes in the dark. She swung the glasses nearer shore. Ah, there lay the Saxonia, with her three rows of glowing portholes near the water; the binoculars even picked out the double column of smoke from her stacks. Three brief hours and that mass of shadow would be moving—moving—

A noise, very slight, came from the library behind the opened doors. The marine glasses remained poised in the girl's hands while she listened. Again the noise—a faint metallic click.

She hardly breathed. Turning ever so slowly, she put one hand between the curtains and parted them so that she could look through into the cavernous gloom behind her.

A light moved there—a clear, round eye of light. Behind it was the faintest suggestion of a figure at the double doors—just a blur of white it was, but it moved stealthily, swiftly. She heard a key turn in a lock. Then swiftly the eye of light traveled across the library to the door leading to General Crandall's room. There it paused to cut the handle of the door and keyhole beneath out of darkness. A brown hand slipped into the clear shaft of whiteness, put a key into the keyhole and softly turned it. The same was done for the locks of Lady Crandall's door, on the opposite side of the library, and for the one Jane had just closed behind her—her own door. Then the circle of light, seeming to have an intelligence all its own, approached the desk, flew swiftly to a drawer and there paused. Once more the brown hand plunged into the bore of light, the drawer was carefully opened, and a steel blue revolver reflected bright sparks from its barrel as it was withdrawn.

Jane, hardly daring to breathe and with the heavy curtains gathered close so that only a space for her eyes was left open, watched the orb of light fascinated. It groped under the desk, found a nest of slender wires. There was a "snick, snick!" and the severed ends of the wires dropped to the floor. The burnished dial of the wall safe, set near the double doors, was the next object to come under the restless, searching eye. While light poured steadily upon the circular bit of steel delicate fingers played with it, twisting and turning this way and that. Then they were laid upon the handle of the safe door, and it swung noiselessly back. A tapering brown hand, white sleeved, fumbled in a small drawer, withdrew a packet of papers and selected one.

Jane stepped boldly into the room.

"Sahibah!" The white club of the electric flash smote her full in the face.

"What are you doing at that safe, Jaimihr Khan?" Jane spoke as steadily as she could, though excitement had its fingers at her throat, and all her nerves were twittering. She heard some sharply whistled foreign word, which might have been a curse.

"Something that concerns you not at all, Sahibah," the Indian answered, his voice smooth as oil. He kept the light fair on her face.

"I intend that it shall concern me," the girl answered, taking a step forward.

"Veree, veree foolish, Sahibah!" Jaimihr whispered, and with catlike stride he advanced to meet her. "Veree foolish to come here at this time!"

Jane, frozen with horror at the man's approach, dodged and ran swiftly to the fireplace, where hung the ancient vesper bell. The flashlight followed her every move—picked out her hand as it swooped down to seize a heavy poker standing in its rack beside the bell.

"Sahibah, do not strike that bell!" The warning came sharp and cold as frost. Her hand was poised over the bell, the heavy stub of the poker a very few inches away from the bell's flare.

"To strike that bell might involve in great trouble one who is veree dear to you, Sahibah. Let us talk this over most calmly. Surely you would not desire that a friend, a veree dear friend"—

"Who do you mean?" she asked sharply.

"Ah! That I leave to you to guess." Jaimihr Khan's voice was silken. "But certainly you know, Sahibah. A friend the most important!"—

Then she suddenly understood. The Indian was referring to Captain Woodhouse thus glibly. Anger blazed in her.

"It isn't true!"

"Sahibah, I am sorry to contradict." Jaimihr Khan had begun slowly to creep toward her, his body crouching slightly as a stalking cat's.

"I'll prove it isn't true!" she cried and brought the poker down on the bell with a sharp blow. Like a tocsin came its answering alarm.

"A thousand devils!" The Indian leaped for the girl, but she evaded him and ran to put the desk between herself and him. He had snapped off the torch at the clang of the bell, and now he was a pale ghost in the gloom—fearsome. Hissing Indian curses, he started to circle the desk to seize her.

"Open this door! Open it, I say!" It was the general's voice, sounding muffled through the panels of his door; he rattled the knob viciously. Jane tried to run to the door, but the Indian seized her from behind, threw her aside and made for the double doors. There his hand went to a panel in the wall, turned a light switch and the library was on the instant drenched with light. Jaimihr Khan threw before the door of the safe the bundle of papers he was clutching when Jane discovered him and which he had gripped during the rushing tense moments. Then he stepped swiftly to the general's door and unlocked it.

General Crandall, clad only in trousers and shirt, burst into the room. His eyes leaped from the Indian to where Jane was cowering behind his desk.

"What the devil is this?" he rasped. Jane opened her mouth to answer, but the Indian forestalled her.

"The sahibah, general—I found her here before your opened safe"—

"Good God!" General Crandall's eyes blazed. He leaped to the safe, knelt and peered in. "A clever job, young woman!"

Jane, completely stunned by the Indian's swift strategy, could hardly speak. She held up a hand, appealing for a hearing. General Crandall eyed her with chilling scorn, then turned to his servant.

"You have done well, Jaimihr."

"It—it isn't true!" Jane stammered. The governor took a step toward her almost as if under impulse to strike her, but he halted, and his lips curled in scorn.

"By gad, working with Woodhouse all the time, eh? And I thought you a simple young woman he had trapped—even warned you against him not six hours ago. What a fool I've been!" Jane impulsively stretched forth her arms for the mercy of a hearing, but the man went on implacably:

"I said he was making a fool of you—and all the time you were making one of me. Clever young woman. I say, that must have been a great joke for you—making a fool of the governor of Gibraltar. You make me ashamed of myself. And my servant—Jaimihr here; it is left to him to trap you while I am blind. Bah! Jaimihr, my orderly—at once!" The Indian smiled sedately and started for the double doors. Jane ran toward the general with a sharp cry:

"General, let me explain"—

"Explain!" He laughed shortly. "What can you say? You come into my house as a friend—you betray me—you break into my safe—with Woodhouse, whom I'd warned you against, directing your every move. Clever—clever! Jaimihr, do as I tell you. My orderly at once!"

CHAPTER XXI.

"Your Prisoner, Sir!"

JANE threw herself between the Indian and the doors.

"One moment. Before he leaves the room let me tell you he lies! Your Indian lies. It was I who found him here—before that safe!"

"A poor story," the general sniffed. "I expected better of you—after this."

"The truth, General Crandall. I couldn't sleep. I came out here to the balcony to try to make out if the Saxonia was in the bay. He came into the room while I was behind these curtains, locked the doors and opened the safe."

"It won't go," the general cut in curtly.

"It's the truth. It's got to go!" she cried.

Jaimihr, at a second nod from his master, was approaching the double doors. Jane, leaping in front of them, pushed the Indian back.

"He lies! Your Indian lies!"

"General Crandall, for your own sake don't let this Indian leave the room. You may regret it—all the rest of your life. He still has a paper—a little paper—he took from that safe. I saw him stick it in his sash."

"Nonsense!"

"Search him!" The girl's voice cracked in hysteria. Her face was dead white, with hectic burning spots in each cheek. "I'm not pleading for myself now—for you. Search him before he leaves this room!"

Jaimihr put strong hands on her arms to force her away from the door. His black eyes were laughing down into hers.

"Let me ask him a question first, General Crandall, before he leaves this room."

The governor's face reflected momentary surprise at this change of tack. "Quickly then," he gruffly conceded. Jaimihr Khan stepped back a pace, his eyes meeting the girl's coldly.

"How did you come into the room—when you found me 'here'?" she challenged. The Indian pointed to the double doors over her shoulder. She reached behind her, grasped the knob and shook it. "Locked!" she announced.

"Why not?" Jaimihr asked. "I locked them after me."

"And the general's door was locked?"

"Yes, yes!" Crandall broke in impatiently. "What's this got to do with"—

"Did you lock the general's door?" she questioned the Indian.

"No, sahibah; you did."

"And I suppose I locked the door to Lady Crandall's room and my door?"

"If they, too, are locked—yes, sahibah."

"Then why"—Jane's voice quavered almost to a shriek—"why had I failed to lock the double doors—the doors through which you came?"

The Indian caught his breath and darted a look at the general. The latter, eying him keenly, stepped to his desk and pressed a button.

"Very good. Remain here, Jaimihr," he said. Then to Jane: "I will have him searched as you wish. Then both of you go to the cells until I sift this thing to the bottom."

"General! You wouldn't dare!" She stood aghast.

"Wouldn't I, though? We'll see whether"—

A sharp click sent his head jerking around to the right. Jaimihr Khan, at the door to the general's room, was just slipping the key into his girdle after having turned the lock. His thin face was crinkled like old sheepskin.

"What the devil are you doing?" Crandall exploded.

"If the general sahib is waiting for that bell to be answered he need not wait longer. It will not be answered." Jaimihr Khan purred.

"What's this? What's this?"

"The wires are cut."

"Cut! Who did that?" The general started for the yellow man. Jaimihr Khan whipped a blue barreled revolver out of his broad sash and leveled it at his master.

"Back, General Sahib! I cut them. The sahibah's story is true. It was she who came in and found me at the safe."

"My God! You, Jaimihr—you a spy?" The general collapsed weakly into a chair by the desk.

"Some might call me that, my general." Jaimihr's weapon was slowly swinging to cover both the seated man and the girl by the doors. "No need to search that drawer, General Sahib. Your pistol is pointing at you this minute."

"You'll pay for this!" Crandall gasped.

"That may be. One thing I ask you to remember. If one of you makes a move I will kill you both. You are a gallant man, my general. Is it not so? Then remember!"

Crandall started from his chair, but the uselessness of his bare hands against the snub nosed thing of blue metal covering him struck home. He sank back, with a groan. Keeping them both carefully covered, Jaimihr moved to the desk telephone at the general's elbow. He took from his sash a small piece of paper—the one he had saved from the packet of papers taken from the safe—laid it on the edge of the desk, and with his left hand he picked up the telephone. An instant of tense silence, broken by the wheezing of the general's breath, then:

"Nine-two-six, if you please. Yes, yes. Who is this? Ah, yes. It is I, Jaimihr Khan. Is all well with you? Good! And Bishop? Slain coming down the Rock? Good also!"

Crandall groaned. The Indian continued his conversation imperturbed.

"Veree good! Listen closely! I cannot come, as I have promised. There is work for me here. But all will be well. Take down what I shall tell you." He read from the slip of paper on the desk: "Seven turns to the right, four to the left—press! Two more to the left—press! One to the right. You have that? Allah speed you! Go quickly!"

"There is work for me here.

"Room D!" Crandall had leaped from his chair.

"Correct, my general—Room D." Jaimihr smiled as he stepped away from the telephone, his back against the double doors. The sweat stood white on Crandall's brow; his mouth worked in jerky spasms.

"What—what have you done?" he gasped.

"I see the general knows too well," came the Indian's silken response. "I have given the combination of the inner door of Room D in the signal tower to a—friend. He is on his way to the tower. He will be admitted, one of the few men on the Rock who could be admitted at this hour, my general. One pull of the switches in Room D—and where will England's great fleet be then?"

"You yellow devil!" Crandall started to rush the white figure by the doors, but his flesh quailed as the round cold muzzle met it. He staggered back.

"We are going to wait, my general, and you, American sahibah, who have pushed your way into this affair. We are going to wait—and listen—listen."

The general writhed in agony. Jane, fallen into a chair by the far edge of the desk, had her head buried in her arms and was sobbing.

"And we are going to think, my gen-

A LOST UTOPIA.

Mariners From the Dominion Visit Tropical Island.

The story of an island that nobody owns, an island dropped out of the pockets of struggling Great Britain and picked up by no one; an island where the only wars are those of the long tailed squawking parakeets in the tops of the palm trees, where the only shells that ever drop are cocoanut shells, tossed down by frolicking monkeys; where the beach is of pink coral dust; there everyone is prosperous, there is no road tax, or war tax, or any kind of a tax, and no government to need a tax, and no laws to need a government, and no misbehavers to need a law. Such a story in the midst of submarine alarms, came placidly bobbing to Brooklyn on the tiny cocoanut schooner Canada, sailed by marines from our Dominion, which was discharging her cargo of juicy nuts at Atlantic Basin recently.

The Canada left Philadelphia three months ago for a cruise among the coral islands off the coast of Honduras and Guatemala. She drifted about from one to the other on the summer breezes of the Carribean, and when she had filled her hull with the brown nuts that most of us see only after they have been shaved up and put into pies or sprinkled on baker's cakes, she battened down her one little hatch and spent a couple of weeks cruising among the keys and atolls, looking for inhabited islands not on her regular sailing list.

Many of the coral keys showed traces of having once been inhabited; others were too small for anyone to live on. On one or two stood little villages of empty palm-leaf houses, nesting places now for sea birds. The bland climate had left even the prints of the bare feet of children in the sand floors of the little houses.

One of the few islands, big enough for any nation to want to own, was the Island of Roatan; it was inhabited, but according to the men on the cocoanut schooner, it has dropped between two owners and belongs to neither the one nor the other.

The people of Roatan told the sailors that the island once belonged to Great Britain, but that it had been sold to Guatemala. Guatemala had never paid for it and had never taken possession. The British Government officials left some time ago and no one has ever come to take their places.

The people of Roatan like being ownerless. Every family seems to have a little farm and one or two horses, and to be thoroughly prosperous, without having to work.

The cocoanuts ripen and fall, while the people, mixed Spanish and West Indian, picnic on the sand, and the only labor falling on the people is that of getting nuts peeled and down to the wharf when the schooners come.

The demand for cocoanut pie and cake in the civilized world keeps the market from ever becoming slack, and the Roatanians are able to live like the lillies in the Song of Solomon, toiling not nor spinning.

The Canada can carry a crew of only six men, and there are no passenger accommodations on board. There is no tourist line running to the islands, and if tired, war-weary people want to go there they will have either to supply their own boats or swim.

Shirkers in Khaki.

Next to the men who have made great profits out of the war and apparently done nothing in the conflict, those most criticised by the general Canadian public are the wearers of khaki who draw officer's salaries and never go to the front. A good deal is said about them in private, especially when they become recruiting officers, but the first man to tackle them in public was Rev. W. E. Millson, a Methodist clergyman of St. Thomas. Recently the minister, speaking to a Sunday evening congregation, hotly berated officers who go overseas, but do not reach the front, and stated that he had heard one in particular speak at a recruiting meeting of the yellow streak up the backs of young men who do not enlist. He declared that that young officer had the most offensive streak of yellow. The result of this sermon was a hot altercation between Mr. Millson and a major of an overseas battalion, and this caused the affair to become public. The matter of officers who have not been to the front calling civilians "yellow" is one that the newspapers have not taken up at great length, and speeches can hardly be made about it. For that reason the St. Thomas clergyman is attracting considerable attention. It was timely in view of the current rumor that one major who only got as far as England intends to come back to Canada for the purpose of conducting a recruiting campaign and urging young men to go to France as privates.

"Creoles."

Harris Dickson, who knows a great deal about New Orleans, declared in an article published some years ago, that outside lower Louisiana the word "Creole" is still misunderstood, and added this definition of the term: "A person of mixed French and Spanish blood, born in Louisiana." Between the dialect of the Louisiana Cajun (Canadian) and that of the French Canadian of Quebec there is a strong resemblance; the Creole negro language is a thing entirely apart, being made up, it is said, partly from French and partly from African word sounds, just as the "gulla" of the South Carolina coast is made up from African and English. Much of the temperament, the gayety, the sensitiveness of New Orleans comes from the Creole. He was Latin enough to be a good deal of a gambler, to love beautiful women, and on slight provocation to draw his sword.

YOUNG MUSICIAN HELD.

Violinist From Toronto Now a Prisoner in Austria.

The lack of $50 a month menaces the musical career of Louis Ruthenberg, a gifted Toronto youth. Ruthenberg has been detained in Austria, where he had just completed his training, since the war began. He was given the privilege extended to several wealthy fellow-students of being undisturbed by paying the cost of his maintenance, $50 a month. This through the generosity of certain Toronto musical enthusiasts, he has been able to do until within the last few weeks. It is now proposed by those taking an interest in him to raise a trust fund of $1,000 to ensure the safety of the young artist, whose career as a violinist would be ruined were he forced into the rough life of an internment camp, thus destroying the delicate training of years of the hands and arms. His parents are in humble circumstances. They made sacrifices to give the boy his preliminary education. Now Ruthenberg, senior, who is practically blind, and is 65 years of age, earns a precarious livelihood as a Hebrew teacher. His wife has been a cripple for 20 years. Louis Ruthenberg was born in Toronto about 22 years ago. He left for Europe in the fall of 1910, equipped with a $300 violin, the gift of musical sponsors in Toronto, and with a banking credit supplied by local patrons. As a pupil of Frank Blachford, he had several times been heard in recital, and two concerts were held, to which leading artists contributed, to assist him, so that he could continue his training under the great Sevick, of Pesik, Bohemia, teacher of Kubelik and Marie Hall. Ruthenberg, who was known here as "the boy wonder," was the first Torontonian to gain admittance to the Sevick Meisterschule. His teacher has since exerted his influence with the Austrian military authorities to prevent Ruthenberg being mistreated. Shortly after the war broke out the Duke of Connaught was interested in Ruthenberg's case and endeavored to secure his release. Since then communication has been had at times with the young man through the United States State Department and American consular officials in Austria.

Special Research Work.

The assistant professor of biology of Macdonald College, W. P. Fraser, M.A., has been appointed in connection with the special investigations on grain rust to be conducted at the recently erected field laboratories at Brandon, Man., and Indian Head, Sask. The Western farmers have suffered serious losses from the uncontrolled ravages of this widespread disease of grain. The average annual loss throughout the world from rust exceeds $100,000,000, but in years when the disease appears epidemically, as in 1904 and 1916, losses for Canada and the U. S. A. alone amounted to nearly $250,000,000 ($150,000,000 actual report from U.S.A and $100,000,000 estimated for Canada). From these figures it will be seen how very important every effort must appear directed against the losses from this source in the future.

Mr. Fraser is a Canadian by birth, he is a graduate in Arts (B.A.) of Cornell University, and a Master of Arts of Dalhousie University, Halifax, N.S. For a number of years he has carried on successful experiments with plant rusts, the results of which have established the life histories of fourteen species previously unknown to science, besides having confirmed the life history of many more and having added much to a general knowledge of the rusts. He is the author of numerous contributions on the subject to leading scientific periodicals. In grain rust he has made special researches, which have not yet been published. It would appear from these qualifications that Mr. Fraser is eminently suitable for this difficult research.

Women Get Votes.

Before the outbreak of the war, the coming of woman's suffrage in Canada was looked upon as a certainty, but a thing of the dim future. In less than a year, however, it has swept to success in half the Dominion. Women got the vote last year in Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and British Columbia, in the order named, and now Ontario has come into line. The history of women's suffrage in the rest of the world may be briefly summarized as follows:

Wyoming	1869
Isle of Man	1861
New Zealand	1893
South Australia	1895
Utah	1896
Idaho	1896
West Australia	1900
New South Wales	1902
All Australia (Federal vote)	1902
Tasmania	1903
Queensland	1905
Finland	1906
Norway	1907
Victoria	1908
Washington	1910
California	1911
Kansas	1912
Oregon	1912
Arizona	1912
Alaska	1913
Illinois (Federal and municipal)	1913
Montana	1914

Niagara Falls Erosion.

Canada is rapidly gaining possession of the greater part of Niagara Falls. The American Falls now carry less than a twentieth of the entire flow. For 200 years or more the centre of Horseshoe Falls has been receding by erosion at the rate of about five feet a year. The edge of the American Falls recedes much more slowly—only a few inches a year. As the Canadian Falls drop back toward Lake Erie they receive a larger and larger volume of water.

News About Town

Pinkerton Fair, Friday Sept. 21.

Mr. Robt. Goode lost a valuable heavy mare by drowning, at his farm on the Durham Road.

Mr. Con. Krug, ex-Mayor of Chesley, will be a speaker at the Preparedness Garden Party here next Tuesday.

Mr. Jim Cameron, Walkerton's leading retiring farmer, has joined the Greater Production movement. Mr. Cameron looked as good as three men as his stalwart form appeared on Durham St. Tuesday clad in overalls, and he hastened countryward to help a farmer friend to haul in.

Prominent Speakers Coming

Hon. Dr. Jameson, Speaker of the Ontario Legislature and C. M. Bowman M. P. P. will be among the prominent speakers at the Garden Party which the Walkerton Branch of the Walkerton Branch of the Bruce Preparedness League will give on the Armory Lawn next Tuesday night.

Look For Big Crowd

The local Preparedness League is counting on a big crowd at their Garden Party at the Armoury Lawn next Tuesday evening. There is room for thousands and they hope to see the grounds well filled. The League looks for big support from their country friends who have been well supported by the town's people in connection with their Patriotic affairs this summer and they believe they won't count on the farmers in vain. The proceeds will go to swell Patriotic funds.

SERGT. GEO. KINGSBURY

Mrs. Sam Saunders had the following interesting letter last week from Geo. Kingsbury:–

Dear Mrs. Saunders:–

Your letter arrived while I was home on leave. I was very glad to hear from you once more. By the above address, you will see where I am stationed at present. Well, guess you will not see me this year, after all. They will not grant me leave to Canada, if my mother was living across the water, I would have got it alright. So there you are, but cheer-o. Shall be coming back to you some day. The war cannot last forever. We have a long, long way to go yet, but we will win out, we have got to. When coming to this camp, found out that the Second in Command, was one of my old Officers in France. We were in the same Section, so he is doing his best to get me a good job in this Country. At the present time, I have a nice quiet job. I am working in the Goods Yard, doing the Checking. I do not mind having a soft job for a few months, could do with it, and then I will be quite ready for France again. We are having very bad weather just now, raining practically every day. Well, news is very scarce just now. I suppose you have been reading up the War news, what do you think of Russia? If it was not for the way the Russians have turned back, the war would have been over by now. How is Mr. Saunders? Please remember me to him, I hope he is quite well. Well, Goodbye, will write again soon, and hoping you are as well as you possibly can be,

I remain
Your friend,
George Kingsbury

CANADA'S GRAND OLD MAN.

Editor Telescope,
Walkerton, Ont.

Dear Sir:–

Will you kindly allow me as a reader of the Telescope to say a few words through your paper in favor of Canada's Grand Old Man. Some years, before that eminent statesman, the Hon. E. W. Gladstone died he was called England's grand old man by the people of that country. In the light of subsequent events we think he rightly deserved that title, but we will confine ourselves to our Subject in hand, namely Canada's grand old man. We mean the man who for the last months has been standing up manfully to what he believed to be the rights and liberties of the Canadian people against a Government which by might and main tries to enforce a law upon the people without as much as asking their opinion. We venture to ask the question, is this government by the people- the opinion of a few forced upon the great majority. We believe Sir Wilfrid was right when he asked for a referendum on this very grave question. We believe he had perfect right when he called the sitting parliament a Rump of a Parliament that had no right in passing such a law without first getting the mandate from the people. We believe Sir Wilfrid has taken the position of a true Canadian namely that the power to make Conscription law lies only with the Canadian people. Therefore we believe he is a true Statesman, yea, rightly entitled to be called Canada's grand old man. We hope if there is an election in the near future that the sound common sense of all true Canadians will show itself by voting for and getting into power Sir Wilfrid Laurier Canada's true Canadian Statesman.

Bruce County Farmer.

PUBLIC WELCOME GIVEN

By Citizens of Walkerton to Sergts. Jack Burke and Rupert Etherton Just back From Overseas

The Town Hall was filled Tuesday night for the reception to the two returned soldiers, Sergts Jack Burke and Rupert Etherton. Addresses of welcome from the Town were presented to the two men by Mayor Johnston and Rev. R. Perdue, secretary of the local branch of the Bruce Preparedness League, presented ten dollar gold pieces. Mr. John Rowland gave warm praise to the two soldiers and paid a tribute to the fighting qualities of Sergt. Burke, whose father was an Irish soldier before him, he himself having come through two wars. Sergt. Burke roasted the young men who should be in khaki and aren't. Being an Irishman and spoiling for a fight, he said when he couldn't get anybody to fight here he had to start for Germany. Jack was warmly applauded when he turned and handed the ten dollar gold piece to his proud old mother who occupied a seat beside him on the platform. Sergt. Etherton had a blank hand grenade with him and greatly interested the audience by a demonstration of how these death-dealing instruments are thrown.

Short speeches were also given by Mr. W. M. Shaw, Reeve Russell, Rev. J. W. Sanderson, Judge Greig, Mrs. (Judge) Klein. The addresses were interspersed by enjoyable solos by Miss Donalda McKechnie and Miss Vera Dippel, also a nice solo by A. S. Royce entitled "A Letter From the Front".

PLOW THE GARDEN.

Loosening the Soil Has a Beneficial Effect on Future Crops.

Winter plowing of the garden is of extreme importance in Oklahoma, for it offers a practical method of helping solve the drought problem. The loosened soil is in an ideal condition to absorb water. The winter snows melt and are absorbed, scarcely any of the water that falls as rain is lost, and as a result a vast store of moisture is available later in the year when rains are scarce and the plants need water.

Likewise winter plowing is beneficial in other ways. The alternate freezes and thaws break up the soil particles, liberate plant food and put the ground in an ideal physical condition. Insects in large numbers are killed by the cold winter weather, and the trash which lies upon the ground rots and becomes available for plant use. Moreover, ground which is winter plowed warms up early in the spring and in rainy seasons can frequently be planted before it is possible to do spring plowing.—C. W. Rapp, Department of Horticulture, Oklahoma Agricultural College.

DASHEEN A TUBER MUCH LIKE POTATO

The dasheen, a root crop introduced into this country from Trinidad within recent years by the United States department of agriculture, is now grown by a considerable number of farmers and truckers in the south and promises to become a valuable member of the group of domestic vegetables, such as the potato, which furnish starchy foods. The dasheen is itself primarily a tropical plant. It can be grown successfully, however, not only in the warmer portions of Florida, but in other sections of the south as far north as South Carolina. The edible portion of the plant includes a large central corm and a number of tubers, of much smaller size, attached to and around the corm.

In food value the dasheen is comparable to the potato, though it contains a small proportion of water and a greater proportion of protein, starch and sugar than the latter. The new vegetable may be prepared for the table as potatoes usually are or may be made into flour and used in baking.

The dasheen is grown from whole tubers weighing a few ounces. They require a frostless season of at least seven months with plenty of moisture. A moist but well drained, rich, sandy loam has been found to be satisfactory soil for dasheen culture. A large proportion of either clay or muck in the soil produces strong flavored, tough corms which are often unfit for table use. Large crops are produced under such conditions, however, and make excellent stock feed.

CLUMP OF DASHEEN TUBERS.

The crop is planted in February in southern Florida and as late as the early part of April in South Carolina. The plants are spaced about 3½ by 3½ feet. Dasheens may be dug for home use by the middle of September, and the main crop can be harvested at any time after the last of October.

Silage Keeps Two Years.

Referring to silage carried over from one year to another, M. N. Nathaniel of Henderson county, Ill., reports in the Drovers' Telegram that he had silage left in the spring of 1914 which he fed out in the early months of 1916. The only waste was a thin crust on top. "The silage was just as good as though it had been put in a few months previously," he said. "This is one of the great advantages of this feed."

AROUND THE DAIRY.

Fear, cold, any kind of discomfort, is expensive in a dairy herd. Comfort always means profit. It is up to you if your cows do not turn you a profit.

Never mix warm and cold cream or sweet and slightly tainted cream.

Wooden pails should not be used for milking, as they easily become sour and cannot be thoroughly cleansed.

No loud talking should be permitted in the stable, and it is best that the cows be milked by the same persons in the same order at each milking.

Regularity in milking aids in developing a tendency to prolong the period of lactation.

Mrs. Jacob Schneider who was knocked down by an auto a week ago last Saturday evening on our Main street has recovered nicely and is able to be about again.

Mrs. MacDonald and children of Niagara Falls, N. Y., are spending a few weeks with her mother Mrs. J. Hinsperger and other relatives here.

Mrs. T. Desmond and Mrs. P. O'Reilly of Eden Grove visited at Mrs. Peter Lenahan's this week.

Mr. and Mrs. George Lambertus of Walkerton made a short visit in town on their way to Teeswater last Saturday.

Mr. John Juergens of the 10th con. whose barn was burned down by lightning two weeks ago, purchased an unused barn of Mr. Henry Schnurr north of the town and had the same torn down and conveyed to his farm. A large number of his neighbors turned out and helped to haul the lumber and timber. Mr. Juergens will erect the framework as soon as possible.

The Mildmay bowlers are enjoying the new sport on the bowling green every evening. A good number of our citizens are taking part in the game.

Miss Margaret Stewart visited friends at Paisley last Saturday and Sunday.

Miss Grace Yost visited friends in town last Thursday.

Mrs. F. A. Wilson and her two children, Dorothy and Ardith of Sardis, B. C. is visiting at the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Wendt.

Miss Pearl Wilson of Walkerville is spending a few days with Miss Edith Mackie.

The crops in this locality are very good. A good many farmers have all their wheat in the barn and part of their barley. Corn and roots show marked improvement after last week's rain.

BRANT AVENUE

Harvesting is in full swing and some farmers are having some job trying to cut the heavy lying-down grain and if weather permits cutting will be nearly completed this week.

Mr. Pete Zuber purchased a handsome 3 year old bay driver last week and intends doing some driving from now on as wheeling isn't very convenient some times especially when you meet certain company.

Mr. Andrew Zettler is building an addition to his barn and last Friday forenoon he had the raising and everything went fine as Mr. John Weber of Carlsruhe did the carpenter work. And in the evening about 45 of the young folks gathered together and enjoyed themselves in dancing, card playing, and various amusements till the "wee sma' hours of the morn." All present said it was a dandy time.

Mr. Gregg Kraemer who has been residing in East Jordan, Mich., for the past eleven years visited his cousin, Mrs. F. Ernst over Sunday prior to leaving on Thursday on C. P. R. Harvesters' Excursion to Elbow, Sask. and also to Tribune, Sask., for it is over 15 years ago since he was up West last.

Miss Katherine Sutter of St. Catherines, Ont., who is spending a few weeks at her home, spent a few days last week with her sister, Mrs. Andy Zettler.

Miss Emma Kirschner who has been working for some time at Mr. John Hueghan's left on Sunday for Wingham on a visit.

Mr. Angus Campbell has a fine barn now since Mr. Wrightson of Glamis remodelled it some few weeks ago. He sure is an "expert mechanic" at the framing and carpenter work.

As hired help is quite scarce in this vicinity our farmers and the boys have to work hard all week and a few of the young lads take advantage of Saturday and Sunday nights; a few in particular arrive home quite early (in the morning.) Somebody must have a friend.

Mr. John Scanlan and son, Pete of Beaver Glen Farm near Formosa, helped Mr. Peter Scanlon last week at his hay which was a heavy crop.

THE PATHEPHONE

Five of these Large cabinet phonographs, each with twelve records, given as first prizes in District Contests. Value, $150.00. Size 22 in. x 22½ in. x [illegible] in. high.

Enter the Bread Making Contests

at Rural School Fairs in Ontario

The Campbell Flour Mills Company's great offer of the big One-Hundred-and-Fifty-Dollar Pathe phonographs (Five of them!) and other valuable prizes, for the best loaves of bread baked with Cream of the West flour, is stirring up tremendous interest all over Ontario. Many girls are already busy as bees practising with Cream of the West flour. Last year many girls declared, "Oh, if I had only practised, I'm sure I could have won!" Don't wait another day. Decide right now! Practise, Practise, Practise with

the hard wheat flour that is guaranteed for bread

Every time you bake with it you find out new qualities in this flour that make such splendid big loaves of delicious light bread. Practise!

In five districts, each comprising several counties, we will give away free to the winner of the first district prize a large cabinet phonograph. At each fair there will be given a fine list of local prizes.

Prizes Worth Trying Hard For

1st Local Prize.—"Girls' Own Annual," a great big beautifully bound, illustrated book with 800 pages of stories and articles about people, art, animals, gardens, sewing, crocheting—everything that particularly interests young girls, older girls and their mothers. This is a wonderful prize that you can treasure for years.

2nd Local Prize.—"Stories of Famous Men and Women," heavily cloth bound with gold titles, many beautiful pictures in colors, entrancing life stories of Florence Nightingale, Grace Darling, Flora MacDonald, Jenny Lind, the late Queen Victoria, and others.

3rd Local Prize.—"Britain Overseas," a big handsomely bound book with many colored pictures, interesting stories and descriptions of the countries and the peoples of Britain's world wide Empire.

4th Local Prize.—"The Queen's Gift Book," a book of stories, pictures and special articles by Britain's best writers, the proceeds from the sale of this book are for the benefit of disabled soldiers in England.

Note.—Unless the entries number six or more only first and second prizes will be awarded. Unless the entries number ten or more no fourth prize will be awarded.

The District Prizes.—The winner of the first prize at each local fair automatically becomes a competitor for the following District prizes.

1st District Prize.—The "Pathephone" is the name given to the fine big mahogany phonograph we offer as first prize. It will give you endless pleasure and entertainment for a lifetime. It has special reproducer attachments and needles, enabling you to play all kinds of flat disc records of no matter what make. The Pathephone reproduces band music, orchestra music, songs and funny pieces perfectly; with it goes a dozen of the famous Pathe records. Total value, $150.00.

2nd District Prize.—Set of Dickens' Works, 13 splendidly bound volumes with many illustrations. Among the books in the set are "Oliver Twist" and "Old Curiosity Shop." These are two of the most entrancing stories ever written.

3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes.—"Canuck" Bread mixers. This simple, yet well-made machine, takes the hard work out of bread making. Instead of laborious kneading of the old method, you just put in the ingredients, turn the handle, and the dough is thoroughly and more evenly mixed.

Read Carefully Conditions of Contest

Every girl may compete at the rural school fair in her district, whether or not she attends school, providing that her 12th birthday occurs before November 1st, 1917 or her 19th birthday does not occur before Nov. 1, 1917. One loaf of bread must be submitted baked in pan about 7 x 5 inches and 3 inches deep, and divided into twin loaves, so that they may be separated at the fair. The loaf must be baked with Cream of the West Flour. One-half will be judged at the fair. The other half of the prize loaf will be sent to Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph, to compete in the District Contests. The judging will be done by Miss M. A. Purdy, of the Department of Breadmaking and Flour Testing. The local contest at the fair will be conducted under the same rules as all the other regular contests at your fairs.

The Standard by which bread will be judged will be as follows:

1. Appearance of Loaf		15 marks
(a) Color	5 marks
(b) Texture of crust	5 marks
(c) Shape of loaf	5 marks
2. Texture of Crumb		40 marks
(a) Evenness	15 marks
(b) Silkiness	20 marks
(c) Color	5 marks
3. Flavor of Bread		45 marks
(a) Taste	25 marks
(b) Odor	20 marks

Important.—Each loaf must be accompanied by the part of the flour bag containing the face of the Old Miller, and an entry form must be signed by the girl and parents or guardian stating date of birth, P.O. address, and giving name of dealer from whom Cream of the West Flour was purchased. The form will state that the girl actually baked the loaf entered in the competition. The forms will be provided at the time of the fair. The decision of the judges is final. Not more than one entry may be made by each girl and not more than one local prize will be awarded to the same family.

Which District is Yours?—This list shows you which counties you compete against if you become a competitor for the District prizes:

District No. 1.—Counties of Glengarry, Stormont, Dundas, Grenville, Leeds, Frontenac, Lennox and Addington, Carleton, Lanark, Renfrew.

District No. 2.—Counties of Hastings, Prince Edward, Peterboro, Northumberland, Victoria, Durham.

District No. 3.—Counties of York, Ontario, Peel, Halton, Wentworth, Oxford, Brant, Waterloo (with a few fairs in Wellington and Perth).

District No. 4.—Counties of Welland, Haldimand, Norfolk, Elgin, Kent, Essex, Lambton, Middlesex (with a few fairs in Huron and Lincoln).

District No. 5.—Counties of Bruce, Grey, Dufferin, Simcoe, Districts of Muskoka, Parry Sound, Timiskaming, Algoma, Manitoulin.

THE RESULTS of the contests at the fair will be made known in the usual way as in the case of all the other regular contests. The District results will be announced as soon as possible after the conclusion of the Rural School Fairs in the Province.

DO NOT MISS THIS GREAT OPPORTUNITY. Every girl between 12 and 19 years should compete. What a splendid way to stir up increased interest in breadmaking! Get a supply of Cream of the West Flour at your dealers and practise using it as often as possible to increase the chances of winning. If your dealer cannot sell it to you, write to the Campbell Flour Mills Co., Ltd., Toronto, and we will promptly tell you the nearest place to get it.

NO COMPETITIONS IN COUNTIES NAMED BELOW: The competition is open to all parts of the Province where Rural School Fairs are held, except the Districts of Rainy River, Kenora and Thunder Bay. These districts are the only parts of the Province where school fairs are held by the Dept. of Agriculture in which this competition will not be a feature. There are no district representatives of the Department of Agriculture in the Counties of Sudbury, Huron, Perth, Wellington, Haliburton, Prescott, Russell or Lincoln, and no rural school fairs are held in these Counties by the Dept. of Agriculture. There are, however, a few fairs held by local schools in Wellington, Perth, Huron and Lincoln, and these are included in the competition.

After Big Game.

Since the mysterious appearance of a deer in this vicinity a few weeks ago, many of the local hunters have been keeping a sharp look out for the animal. Last week the deer was seen near Formosa, and a local sport undertook to bag the big game. After an exciting chase, he succeeded in getting into close range with the animal, and was about to shoot when he discovered that it was not the deer at all, but a Jersey calf.—Mildmay Gazette.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson IX.—Third Quarter, For Aug. 26, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, II Kings xxv, 1-21. Memory Verses, 10, 11—Golden Text, Ezek. xxxiii, 11—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

The topic of this lesson is the captivity of Judah, for, although such men as Hezekiah and Josiah did what they could to turn the people from their sins to the Lord, the results were only partial and temporary, and their sins increased. The Lord God had compassion on them, notwithstanding their rebellion against Him, and sent them His messengers, His servants the prophets, to tell them of His love and His readiness to forgive them and bless them if only they would turn to Him with the whole heart, but they mocked the messengers of God and despised His words and misused His prophets until the wrath of the Lord arose against His people, till there was no remedy (II Chron. xxxvi, 15, 16). Many times He had told them in the beginning of their national history how He would bless them in the land He had given them if only they would obey Him and honor Him and keep themselves from the idolatries of other nations. See for example Lev. xxvi, 1-13.

He told them just as plainly what He would do to them and how He would punish them if they would not hearken to Him and keep His commandments (Lev. xxvi, 14-39). Three times in that chapter He told them that if they persisted in disobedience He would punish or chastise them seven times for their sins, an expression which we will consider later in our lesson (Lev. xxvi, 18, 21, 28). Not only during their wilderness journey, but also while the judges ruled, and afterward when He gave them kings, He many a time forgave their iniquity and delivered them and saved them for His name's sake (Ps. lxxviii, 38; cvi, 8, 43), but the time had come when there was no remedy but the captivity.

Josiah was succeeded by four kings, three sons and a grandson, each of whom did evil in the sight of the Lord, and during the twenty-two years of their reigns Judah was carried into captivity in three different companies until all but the very poorest were carried away. The fourth year of Jehoiakim was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, and in that year, which would be about 606 B. C., some of the princes, including Daniel and others, and part of the vessels of the house of God were carried to Babylon (Jer. xxv, 1; Dan. i, 1-3). About seven years later Jehoiakim, who reigned only three months, was taken to Babylon, with his mother and servants and princes and officers and 10,000 others (perhaps 18,000) II Kings xxiv, 8, 16), and this was the second deportation. Eleven years later, in the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar, the captivity of Judah was completed by the carrying away of Zedekiah and the rest of the people, except the poor, who were left to be vinedressers and husbandmen. Then was the house of the Lord burned and the remaining vessels destroyed or carried away (II Kings xxv, 1-17). Then was fulfilled the strange prediction through Ezekiel concerning Zedekiah, "I will bring him to Babylon, yet shall he not see it," for after his sons were slain before his eyes they put out his eyes and bound him and carried him to Babylon (Ezek. xii, 13; Kings xxv, 7).

However seemingly impossible any prediction of the Lord may appear, it will surely be literally fulfilled in His time, either by a near or a far distant fulfillment, or ofttimes by both, for as one has said, prophecy may have many a germinal fulfillment, while the full accomplishment may be still in the future. The Lord had said through Jeremiah that this punishment of Judah would continue seventy years and that then they would return, and so it came to pass, as we shall see in future lessons (Jer. xxv, 12, II Chron. xxxvi, 20-23). Because Israel rejected their Messiah, when in the fullness of time He came to them, they have ever since been scattered among all nations, and He said that Jerusalem would be trodden down by the gentiles until the times of the gentiles be fulfilled (Luke xxi, 24).

The times of the gentiles began with Nebuchadnezzar, 606 B. C., and correspond with the seven times already referred to in this lesson, during which God said that He would punish Israel for their sins. According to Dan. xi, 13, margin, times are years, and in Num. xiv, 34, there is a way of the Lord revealed, wherein He used years for days. Seven times 360, the days in a Scriptural year, equals 2,520, which seems to cover the seven times of Israel's punishment in Lev. xxvi, or the times of the gentiles. Now, 606 B. C. added to 1914, the year in which the present European war began, gives 2,520, and there seems therefore to be good reason for believing that the times of the gentiles began to run out in 1914. As they began gradually with the three deportations of Judah referred to in this lesson, so it may require eighteen years, more or less, to end them. Since, then, we are already in the beginning of the end of these times, how fully occupied we should be in giving the gospel to help complete the church, the body of Christ, and hasten the coming of the kingdom of righteousness and peace, always expecting to be caught up any day and yet ready to continue here in His service or be absent from the body and present with the Lord.

PERILS OF AIR FIGHTING.

Many Lessons Learned by Very Bitter Experience.

In a particularly interesting article on air-warfare in Everybody's, William G. Shepherd shows how hard has been the road blazed by the nations of Europe:

"The long, hard road along wh pleasant to view.

"It is a feverish and bloody
gress that has been made in flying Europe. In the laboratory of ae warfare, during the last thirty-th

thousands of airmen, testing new idea, and hundreds of aerial gineers and scientists, madly st gling in their laboratories, achieved a progress that not a dred years of peace could brought about.

"While in peace times we there have been hundreds men in Europe since the w who have lost their lives how aerial warfare ought

Paisley magistrates take the word of their constable in preference to autoists when it comes to speeding, and they fine the motorist. Their constable is provided with a stop watch, and he has a certain distance measured off. Anyone exceeding the speed allotted is fined $5 and costs.

A fellow crazy with the heat propounded this: Two Americans fell out of an airship; what nationality were they when they came down? We let the poor nut rave, and presently he gave us the answer. One came down a Russian, he said; the other landed on the telegraph wires and came down a Pole.

A few days ago a rather bashful young woman went into a store carrying three chickens. She inquired the price of chickens and at the same time put them on the counter. The clerk didn't know the chicken's feet were tied, and asked if they would lay there. She bit her handkerchief and said: No, sir, they are roosters.

Since February 1st, 1915, to August 1st, 1917, Mrs. Reynolds, of Goderich, has knitted 520 pairs of socks, all of which have been knit by her for the soldiers through the medium of the Red Cross and other channels. She knits regularly every week four pairs of socks, a wonderful showing for a blind woman in her eighty-second year. Who can beat it?

Mr. Robt Agnew had a peculiar experience on Monday night and one which he will long remember. He was returning to Tara from a motor trip to Fergus and when near Arthur noticed a cow coming towards him on the gallop chased by a dog. Mr. Agnew stopped his car but the enraged cow did not halt and smashed into his car, breaking the bumper and fender and bending the front axle.—Tara Leader.

Mr Thos. Switzer, of Saugeen, lost a horse in a peculiar manner on Thursday. His team took fright as they were hauling a load of hay to the barn. They went up the gateway at top speed, continued across the floor of the barn and went crashing through the other side of the barn, smashing off the boards, and dropped to the ground, which there is about ten feet down. One steed was killed in the drop. The waggon remained on the barn floor. Mrs. Switzer was the driver, and she jumped off the load safely.

—Wiarton School Board are petitioning the Department of Education to have the Entrance papers of the school re-examined, owing to the large number who failed to pass the Entrance examination. The Board also desires an investigation as to the promotion of pupils from one class to another without examination, on presentation of doctor's certificates as to illness. To make matters interesting, the local doctors are threatening to sue the School Board for libel unless the latter retract their statement regarding the medical certificate and make ample apology.

Advertising!

in its highest sense is the creation of a new want and providing the means with which to apply that want. The aim of Advertising is not to spread the name of a firm so much as to get business for that firm. The ad. that counts is the one that makes the luxuries of today the necessities of tomorrow. A great many people advertise as they give to charity—merely to get rid of a solicitor. Then the advertiser says it doesn't pay and when done in that spirit it does not. Advertisers must put brain and selling force into their their copy, and when this is done they find that advertising is not an expense, but the finest kind of an investment. —S. C. A "Gad-About" Editor –

Harriston Review—The Clifford Express announced last issue a two week's suspension of publication, "In order that ye editor and his wife, as well as the girls, may each have a full quota of relaxation." That's all very well, as far as it goes, but we fear Editor Aitchison is getting to be a sad gad-about. Why it's no time at all since he printed a two-column description of a joy-ride, when he went galavanting all over five or six counties. He sure must be a great hand at "visitin' around," as Deacon Perkinson would say.

Coughed Up Pipe Stem

Wingham Times—Some months ago while riding down a hill on his bicycle in Brantford, Mr. Thos. Smale ran into a telephone pole. He had his pipe in his mouth at the time and in going against the pole the pipe was broken and Mr. Smale swallowed a piece of the stem some three inches in length. This caused a great deal of discomfort, and Mr. Smale was unable to get rid of the pipe stem. He was visiting in Wingham for over Sunday and on Sunday afternoon in a fit of coughing the pipe stem came up, much to the comfort of Mr. Smale.

If at First You Don't Succeed—

That one should not be discouraged by such small things as being nearly drowned a few times while learning to swim seems to have been the idea of a young lady at the beach last Sunday. Shortly after entering the water she got beyond her depth and had to be assisted to shore. Nothing daunted, she returned to the water and shortly afterwards stepped into a deep hole near the lifeboat house. A gentleman came to her aid, but she threw her arms around his neck and pulled him under too. He swallowed quite a bit of water and took a cramp, so that it was necessary to pull them both out. The would-be rescuer lay on the pier for some time recovering, while the rescued returned to the water to learn more of the art of swimming.—Goderich Signal.

WALKERTON TELESCOPE

VOL. XLIX, NO. 34 | WALKERTON TELESCOPE, WALKERTON, AUGUST 30th, 1917 | $1.50 A YEAR IN ADVANCE

TAX RATE IS 33 MILLS

Walkerton Town Council Struck the Rate, [illegible] 917 at a Special Meeting [illegible] on Monday Night

The Town Council held a special meeting on Monday night, all the members present, and struck the tax-rate for 1917 at 33 mills. The levy as read by Town Clerk A. Collins, will be as follows;—

Debentures $3,762.70—4.91 mills.
Local Improve $1,172.38—1.53 mills.
County $2,643.86—3.45 mills.
High School $2,897.64—3.51 mills.
Public School $6,316.10—8.16 mills.
Sep. School 1,426.28—8.16 mills.
Pub. Lib.—574.75—.75.
General Exp. 8,192.13—10.69.
Total $25,980.14—33 mills.

Finance Chairman Sam Vogan pointed out that everything costs more this year.

Last year the rate was 31 mills, estimated as follows;—Debentures 4.23, Local Improvement 1.14, County 3.35, High School 3.18, Public School 7.29, Separate School 7.29, Public Library .75, Gen. Purpose, 10.76. Total, 31 mills.

The 33 mill rate should be adequate this year providing the various Committees keep within their estimates and providing also that unforseen demands do not arise after the rate has been struck as was the case last year.

Mayor Johnston stated that the overdraft left from last year, together with the increased requirements of the School Boards and County, and the payment of Saddlery debentures ($600), meant an increase of 4½ mills this year over which the present Council has absolutely no control. Under those circumstances he thought the Council was doing well to hold the rate down to 33. He believed that every Council should pay its own way and he did not want to see any indebtedness left unpaid by the present Council.

The total assessment of the town this year is 826,537,08. After deducting industrial assessment of 59,200, the rate struck on a net assessment of 766,337, Removing to Detroit.

Mr. Mike O'Hara was in town this week and called on many of his old-time friends. Mr. and Mrs. O'Hara are leaving Wiarton to make their home at Detroit.

Little Boy Killed.

Lloyd George Reid, a bright little nephew of Rev. G. C. Rock, was fatally hurt by an auto at the corner of College and Spadina, Toronto, while walking home from church on Sunday night with his mother. The little lad was just eight years old. Mr. Rock went to Toronto Wednesday to attend the funeral.

Public Reception

On Friday night a public reception is to be given at the Town Hall to Lance Corp. Harry Hefferman, a former Walkerton boy, who was recently invalided home from France. Harry is coming up from Guelph on a visit to his mother, Mrs. H Hefferman, Victoria St and a number of citizens are clubbing together to get up a fitting welcome.

Jim Russell Wounded

Reeve Robert Russell had a telegram on Tuesday from Ottawa stating that his son, James Russell had received gunshot wounds in the ear and chest. Jim was the first of the five Russell boys to go Overseas and was connected with No. 2 Canadian Ambulance Corps. Although long at the Front this is the first time his name has appeared on the casualty list.

Y. M. C. A. Conference

A number of young men from town attended the Boys' Conference held at Hanover on Saturday and Sunday under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. Helpful talks were given on boy's work by prominent speakers. The object of the Conference was two-fold: To encourage the boys to take part in the production of food, and to place before teen age boys the methods and opportunities of fitting themselves to take their places, in their respective communities and churches. Farm Service Corps badges were presented to: Clayton Tovell, Vernon Tovell, Victor Eidt, and others. Clayton Tovell of Walkerton won second place in the sports.

David McGregor Wounded

Mrs. W. S. McGregor had a telegram from Ottawa on Monday stating that her son, David McGregor, had been seriously wounded in the thigh with gunshot wound on Aug. 18th. Pte. McGregor enlisted in Edmonton last year with the 194th Alberta Highlanders. He was a company sergeant-major in England but in order to get to the firing line rather than remain in England, he threw up his sergeancy and went back to the ranks, proceeding to the Front with the 10th Batt'n. Before enlisting he was a member of the Queen Own of Toronto.

Death of W. G. Ritchie

Mr. William G. Ritchie, a well-known former resident of this vicinity, passed away at his home near Paisley on Monday afternoon in his 57th year. Mr. Ritchie had been a life-long sufferer from asthma and for several months his condition had been growing gradually worse. He was the son of the late John Ritchie, ex-Reeve of Greenock and was born in Greenock and farmed the old homestead near Enniskillen for a number of years after his father's retirement to town. The late Mr. Ritchie was of a bright and sociable disposition and made friends everywhere he went. For several months he felt that his time would come any moment but when the end came, it found him cheerful and prepared. In his demise, his family has the deepest sympathy of the community. Besides his widow, he leaves a family of four, Garnet, Hazel, Annie and Bertie, all at home. Mrs. Swanston, town; Mrs. Jas. Armstrong of Mayfield, Ont. Mrs. McLennan of Russel, Man; Mrs. Henry Wallace of Crystal, N. Dakota: Mrs. Cosgrove of Rainy River, and Mrs Robt. Ginn, of Dakota, are sisters. John Ritchie of Rosetown, Sask. is an only surviving brother. The funeral took place on Tuesday afternoon, interment being made in the family plot at Greenock cemetery.

"GOD'S ACRE"

Editor Telescope,
Walkerton, Ont.

Dear Sir:—

During this last week I had occasion to visit the cemetery. Before leaving I had the curiosity to visit that part of it owned and used by the County for the last resting place of the inmates of the House of Refuge and of all the forsaken ill-kept desolate places for a cemetery I ever had the misfortune to view, this outclasses them all. It is located away in the extreme corner next the bush with no road leading to it and in almost a primeval condition not even levelled and wild with weeds and rubbish and without the first evidence of any attention being given to its upkeep. I noticed what had the appearance of a newly-made grave and was told that it was the last resting place of "Jimmy Wilson," who was buried two days previous. Surely if poverty is a crime this is an awful penalty for poor Jimmy to pay to be buried in such a neglected spot. On enquiry I was told that he was buried without even the attendance of a clergyman at the grave simply put in the ground by the hired man of the House of Refuge in the presence of the Supt. of the House of Refuge, assisted by several of the inmates. For twenty-five years I have seen Jimmy Sunday after Sunday trudging in from the country to attend church and at the final not even a churchman or minister at the grave. I am going to ask you Mr. Editor to send a copy of this letter to the Warden so that at his next visit the last Friday in each month he will have the opportunity of visiting this so-called cemetery and note its condition. Would it not be a reasonable suggestion to make to him to have it made the duty of the caretaker of the House of Refuge to have a few of his inmates who are able to work clean up this place that some have called "God's Acre." Should it not also be the duty of the County to provide a conveyance to take the minister to the grave.

I was trying to imagine what must have been the condition of the minds of the fellow inmates who accompanied the remains of 'Jimmy' to his last resting place to know that in a very short time their experience would be a similar one. It would be different to inflict these poor unfortunates with a more inhuman punishment than to have this sure prospect before their view.

On enquiry I find that the regular caretaker of the cemetery is no way responsible for the upkeep of the County's.

Citizen.

SENT UP FOR TRIAL

Preliminary Hearing of Martin Hanson of Greenock on Charge of Burning Barn Arouses Great Interest

Martin Hanson, a middle-aged Greenock farmer, appeared before Magistrate James Tolton on Thursday for preliminary trial on a charge of setting fire to a barn belonging to his wife on lot 3, Con. 11, Greenock, two miles west of Cargill. After hearing a number of witnesses, Magistrate Tolton decided to send him up for trial. Crown Attorney Thos. Dixon appeared for the crown, being assisted by David Robertson K. C. Barrister O. E. Klein represented Hanson. The public are taking a warm interest in the case and the court room was crowded, many of the defendant's neighbors being present.

Hanson has been married for thirty years and latterly has been a heavy drinker. His domestic relations may be judged from his statement that when his elbow was badly injured his wife said "She would see it rot off inch by inch before she would attend to it." He then went to his brother's at West Branch, Mich. and had a physician attend to it. That was last year. His wife wrote him that if he would sign the farm over to her, she could obtain a $1,000 loan from a friend. He consented. The friend proved to be her brother Jacob Letakus of Greenock. Two months later Hanson pulled out and since that time has only been living at home intermittently. Lately he has been working in a furniture factory at Hespeler. On August 1st, he bought a ticket from Hespeler to Cargill, but did not get off at Cargill, going on to Paisley. The train arrived at Paisley at 10 p. m. Hanson then hired a rig at Purdue's livery and drove out into the country. He says he drove to the home of a friend, Robt. Sheridan, who lives five miles south-west. Arriving at Sheridan's, according to Hanson's story, he knocked loudly but could make no one hear. Finally he left and drove back to Paisley.

Two hours and a quarter after Hanson stepped off the train at Paisley and made for the livery, the barn on his wife's farm nine miles away was discovered to be in flames. It was on the suspicion that instead of driving to Sheridan's that he drove to his wife's place and in a spirit of revenge set fire to the barn, that the Crown caused the arrest of Hanson. Whether they will be able to connect him in any direct way with the setting of the fire remains to be seen. Hanson apparently has plenty of friends who believe in his innocence, as no less than seven neighbors came forward and offered to go bail for him after he had been committed for trial.

To continue Hanson's story. When he arrived back at Paisley, it was about one o'clock. He had met no person or vehicle on the way. Instead of going to a hotel owing to the late hour, he slept at the barn with the liveryman. In the morning, he had the liveryman drive him over to Chesley for the purpose, he said, of seeing a young man who owed him $3. As the young man was away, he took the train for Hamilton, going from there to Toronto to visit his daughter. There he heard of the fire through his daughter. Hanson said that he had placed $2700 insurance on the barn, house and contents three years ago. This insurance expired lately. He did not know that his wife had insured the buildings and contents for a higher amount ($2900) until his daughter told him after the fire.

Norman Hanson, the third son who lives with his mother at home, stated that about 12.15 a. m. on August 2nd, his mother woke him up. The barn was then in flames at the West end. On running out he met a black calf which was always kept tied in the barn near the gate. The next morning a crippled pig which was also kept in the barn, was found in the wheat. It was further noticed that three of the barn doors were wide open. He believed that somebody had set the barn on fire. He did not know who. Ten days before he had dreamed that the barn was burning and in his dream he saw a person running from the barn whom he recognized as his father. In the dream the fire started at the west end too and was just the same as it actually happened later on. In the barn were 12 tons of new hay and 3 tons of old hay. The building was burned to the ground. His father had visited them six or seven weeks before. He had wanted to stay, and offered to pay board. When he was not permitted to stay by Mrs. Hanson, it angered him.

Mrs. Hanson, on examination, stated that when Hanson paid a note to his son-in-law Spitzig some months ago, he told Spitzig he would just as soon see everything go up in smoke

EDITORIAL COMMENT

BOTH Sir Robert Borden's and Hon. Robert Rogers' letters talk straight to the gallery.

A more effective method of government control of the prices of foodstuffs and like commodities than has yet been excercised in Canada must be devised to satisfy the people.

THE Guelph Mercury, one of Western Ontario's best dailies, celebrated its fifteenth aniversary by issuing a creditable historical number lately. In spite of its years, the Mercury is as frisky editorially as a young colt.

Some one on the Toronto News has set its artist to work on a series of cartoons representing Sir Wilfrid Laurier as the Judas of Canada. And Borden wonders why Liderals are not flocking under his coalition umbrella?—Guelph Mercury.

A gentleman has been borrowed from the United States by the Canadian Food Controller to be paid $25,000 per year. The advice he has to offer is supplied to the newspapers of the country and they are supposed to be patriotic and pass it along to the public free of charge.—Simcoe Reformer.

A contemporary has diagnosed the troubles of the Borden Government as "the hook-worm of laziness." This diagnosis is to a large extent correct and one of the evidences is the large number of commissions which have been appointed to do what the Goverment ought to have done itself.

AT the beginning of this month there were 13,001,751 dozen of eggs, and 19,919,693 pounds of butter in the cold storage plants in Canada. It is said that the reason that eggs are going up in price is because the hens are not laying. Possibly they have got tired of laying when they have seen this game going on.

OUR Government has the commission habit bad. Mr. O'Connor was appointed a commissioner to report on the high cost of living. He did so. Then the government appointed the Henderson commission to report on the railway situation, and now Sir William Meredith is to be named to report as to the value of C. N. R. stock. Is the chief function of parliament to appoint commissions and sidestep responsibility?

ONE of the men writing home from France divulged the secret as to the probable length of the war. He stated that the first five years would be the worst and after that it would assume proportionately better conditions for the Allies in five year periods until the German men of the 1950 class had been exterminated. By that time the German race would be about extinct.

THE Toronto News is running a series of cartoons called the "Mystery of the Bloody Key." in which an attempt is made to picture Laurier as the Judas of Canada. The pity of the thing is that the News' cartoonist is capable of doing good work. The present series that some pinhead has told him to draw is poorer than Mutt and Jeff, if such a thing is possible.—Guelph Mercury.

A lot of Tory editors and wirepullers are busy counting the soldiers votes for their side. We have some reason for believing they will get a big surprise. It was among the soldiers across the water that the administration came in for the hardest knocks. The springing of the conscription issue may overshadow other matters with some of them—but that they will vote as a body is unlikely.—Simcoe Reformer.

A CITIZEN, writing the Telescope in another column, draws a picture of the condition of the House of Refuge graveyard, which should open the eyes of the public. If the facts are as stated, and we are assured that they are correct, it is certainly a disgrace to the community and it is up to the County Council to remedy conditions without delay. The good care that is taken of unfortunate old people at the House of Refuge is altogether to the credit of the County and we believe that the County Council, which has apparently been remiss in looking after the graveyard, will not tolerate the conditions which prevail when their attention is called to the matter.

POETS' CORNER

"AT THE BATH HOUSE"

Below we publish a humorous effusion sent home by one of the boys of the 160th Bruce Batt'n. We imagine we can hear Charlie James singing it as a solo:—

In a village near here there's a bath House,
Of which I've a sad tale to tell,
They send soldiers there who want washing,
And some who want scrubbing as well.
They give you a bath of cold water,
While you wash off the dirt,
And when you've dried yourself on an old towel,
Then they give you a sterilized shirt
They have shirts, shirts, all kinds of shirts,
Shirts that are little and tall;
Shirts of all patterns both thin 'uns and fat uns,
And shirts that aren't shirts at all;
Shirts made [illegible] of old trousers,
And shirts that are old women's skirts;
Socks that have roughed it, since Wellington snuffed it,
Are issued to soldiers as shirts.
They serve you out pants in this bath house,
Which shrivel when water comes nigh,
I once saw a pair of old trousers,
That shrank to an evening dress tie.
I've seen a man's pants start ashrinking,
Until he's been gasping for breath,
Shrink from his knees to his windpipe,
And shrink till they choked him to death
They have pants, pants, all kinds of pants,
Don't judge a man by his pants:
Some have no knees in 'em, all have got flees in 'em,
June-bugs and beetles and ants.
Pants trimmed with fretwork, moth holes and net work,
Pants that would fit elephants:
Bags used by waiters for straining potatoes,
Are issued to soldiers as pants
For vests, they give you shirts without uppers,
The kind that you buy by the peck;
Vests you put on with a shoe-horn,
Or else stick your legs through the neck,
That some vests should have old age pensions,
You cannot deny is the truth,
The one I have on is a night-cap,
My grandfather wore in his youth.
Vests, vests, all kinds of vests,
Vests cheap at four pence an ounce.
Vests trimmed with fretwork, moth holes and net work,
And vests with a tortoise shell flounce;
Vests from the trenches and vests full of stitches:
Some have pressed bullet-proof tests,
Steel helmets and gas are lumped in one class,
And are issued to soldiers as vests.

Military Cross Hero

CAPT. William Stewart MacTier, who was reported yesterday to have been awarded the Military Cross for gallantry in the firing line, is the son of Mr. A. D. MacTier, general manager of eastern lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Capt. MacTier went to the front with the first Canadian Contingent and has been twice wounded, the first time at Ypres, and lately at Vimy Ridge. At the outbreak of the war, Capt. MacTier was on the ocean returning from Europe, and immediately on landing joined the Thirteenth Battalion, under Lieut.-Col. (now Brigadier-General) Loomis, D.S.O. He went to the front with that unit and fought with it when it covered itself with glory at Ypres and Festubert. He was then wounded by shrapnel and returned to Montreal to convalesce. On returning to the front he was attached to Brigadier-General Loomis' staff, he having taken over the command of a brigade in the mean time. At the serving in this capacity for a short time one of his feet gave out and an operation was necessary. On his return to the front on this occasion he was transferred to a Montreal Highland Battalion and promoted to his captaincy.

For the Nearsighted.

A paragraph for the nearsighted. One of the most competent English experts in ophthalmology calls attention to the fact that those nearsighted persons who take off their glasses to read or to do any near work thereby increase the convexity of the eye lens, which is the cause of nearsightedness, and thus gradually create a need for glasses of greater power. He advises them to wear their glasses all the time and to use them both for near and for distant work.

The Camel's Bite.

The camel alone of all ruminants has incisor teeth in the upper jaw, which, with the peculiar structure of his other teeth, make his bite, the animal's first and main defense, most formidable. The skeleton of the camel is full of proofs of design. Notice, for example, the arched backbone, constructed in such a way as to sustain the greatest weight in proportion to the span of the supports. A strong camel can bear a thousand pounds weight, although the usual load in Yemen is not more than 600 pounds.

Iberian Laziness.

If the Spaniards may be regarded as indolent as a race the accusation might be leveled against their neighbors, the Portuguese, with greater justice. Galicia has supplied Portugal with labor for centuries, and the wily little Galegos are figuratively the bees in the Portuguese hive. Southey tells a story of an Englishman at Oporto who asked his servant to carry a box.

"I am a Portuguese, not a beast!" exclaimed the offended native, who walked a mile to find a Galego to carry the burden.

What's In a Name?

A large steamer was once wrecked because one of the sailors was named West. The vessel was outward bound from Rotterdam, and the sailor was on deck polishing some brasswork. Suddenly the captain called him and told him to go below. The second officer on the bridge heard the captain call out the man's name and thought it was an order to change the course of the vessel to west. He did so, and the result was that the ship ran on to a dangerous shoal. That name cost the owners of the vessel the sum of $500,000.

Quicksand.

Quicksand differs from beach and other sand in that the individual grains have become worn by water or wind until the normal facets and angles have been abraded and each grain has become more or less spherical. The coefficient of friction is thus reduced to the minimum and the bed does not pack when dry and when wet behaves like a fluid. The depth of quicksand is conditioned by the depth of the hardpan or other compact material upon which the sand rests.

The Cabal.

The term "cabal" as applied to secret factions of any kind had its rise in England about 1667, being first applied to the cabinet of Charles II. and formed from the initials of the cabinet members' names—Lord Clifford, Lord Ashley, the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Arlington and the Duke of Lauderdale—C. A. B. A. L.

Since that day it has been customary, in all English speaking lands at least, to apply the name to any secret conclave, especially in politics. — Westminster Gazette.

Tail of the Ptarmigan.

One of the most entertaining of chapters in natural history is that which relates to the many curious means that birds and certain animals possess of deceiving the eyes of their enemies. Attention may be called to the following remarkable instance:

When the ptarmigan puts on its winter dress it has a black tail. One might suppose that this would attract attention to the bird crouching on the snow, but, in fact, it serves for concealment. Every projection on a snow field casts a dark shadow, and that is what the tail of the motionless ptarmigan looks like, the body of the bird resembling a mere bump on the white background.—Exchange.

Ich Dien or Eich Dyn.

Which is accurate as the motto of the Prince of Wales—Ich Dien or Eich Dyn? The one is German and the other Welsh. The one means "I serve," the other "Behold the man" or "Behold your man."

"Ich Dien" was the motto of John, king of Bohemia, whom the Black Prince slew at Crecy. "Eich Dyn" are the words supposed to have been used by Edward I. when presenting his infant son to the Welsh assembly at Carnarvon.

Welsh tradition has adhered naturally to the Welsh form. The other has been more popularly accepted.—London Lady's Pictorial.

THE TEST.

The pilot's skill is by no means equally proved in a calm as in a storm. In the former case he tamely enters the port, unnoticed and unapplauded, but when the cordage creaks, the mast bends and the rudder groans, then it is that he shines out in all his glory.—Pliny the Younger.

eral," the Indian's voice purled on. "While we wait we shall think. Who will General Crandall be after tonight—the English sahib who ruled the Rock the night the English fleet was blown to hell from inside the fortress! How many widows will curse when they hear his name! What"—

"Jaimihr Khan, what have I ever done to you?" The governor's voice sounded hardly human. His face was blotched and purple.

"Not what you have done, my general—what the English army has done. An old score, general—thirty years old. My father, he was a prince in India until the English army took away his throne to give it to a lying brother. The army—the English army—murdered my father when he tried to get it back—called it mutiny. Ah, yes, an old score; but, by the breath of Allah, tonight shall see it paid!"

The man's eyes were glittering points of white hot steel. All of his thin white teeth showed like a hound's.

"You dog!" The general feebly wagged his head at the Indian.

"Your dog, my general. Five years your dog when I might have been a prince. My friend goes up the Rock—step—step—step. Closer—closer to the tower, my general. And Major Bishop—where is he? Ah, a knife is swift and makes no noise"—

"What a fool I've been!" Crandall rocked in his chair and passed a trembling hand before his eyes. Sudden rage turned his bloodshot eyes to where the girl was stretched, sobbing, across the desk. "Your man—the man you protected—it is he who goes to the signal tower, girl!"

"No—no; it can't be!" she whispered between the rackings of her throat.

"It is! Only a member of the signal service could gain admittance into the tower tonight. Besides, who was it went with Bishop down the Rock after the dinner tonight? And I—I sent Bishop with him—sent him to his death. He was tricking you all the time. I told you he was. I warned you he was playing with you—using you for his own rotten ends—using you to help kill 40,000 men!"

A knock sounded at the double doors behind Jaimihr. He stopped short, startled. All listened. Again came the knock. Without turning his eyes from the two he guarded Jaimihr asked, "Who is it?"

"Woodhouse," came the answer.

Jane's heart stopped. Crandall sat frozen in his seat. Jaimihr turned the key in the lock, and the doors opened. In stepped Captain Woodhouse, helmeted, armed with sword and revolver at waist. He stood facing the trio, his swift eye taking in the situation at once. Crandall half rose from his seat, his face apoplectic.

"Spy! Secret killer of men!" he gasped.

Woodhouse paid no heed to him, but turned to Jaimihr.

"Quick! The combination," he said. "Over the phone—afraid I might not have it right—stopped here on my way to the tower—be there in less than three minutes if you can hold these people."

"Everything is all right?" Jaimihr asked suspiciously.

"You mean Bishop? Yes. Quick, he combination!"

Jaimihr picked the slip of paper containing the formula from the edge of e desk with his disengaged left hand passed it to Woodhouse.

e latter stretched out his hand, ed the Indian's with a lightning and threw it over so that the r was off his balance. In a kling Woodhouse's left hand had ched the revolver from Jaimihr's t and pinioned it behind his back. whole movement was accomplish a half a breath. Jaimihr Khan in agony and in peril of a broken at the white man's feet, dis harmless. Woodhouse put a whistle to his lips and blew short blasts.

tramp of feet in the hallway out and four soldiers with guns filled doorway.

"Take this man!" Woodhouse commanded.

The Indian, in a frenzy, writhed and shrieked:

"Traitor! English spy! Dog of an unbeliever!"

The soldiers jerked him to his feet and dragged him out. His ravings died away in the passage.

Woodhouse brought his hand up in a salute as he faced General Crandall.

"The other spy, Aimer, of the Hotel Splendide, has just been arrested, sir. Major Bishop has taken charge of him and has lodged him in the cells."

General Crandall took a step toward Woodhouse, who still stood stiffly before the opened doors. The dazed governor walked like a somnambulist.

"Who—who the devil are you, sir?" he managed to splutter.

"I am Captain Cavendish, general." Again the hand came to stiff salute on the visor of the pith helmet. "Captain Cavendish of the signal service, stationed at Khartum, but lately detached for special service under the intelligence office in Downing street."

The man's eyes jumped for an instant to seek Jane Gerson's face—found a smile breaking through the lines of dread. Jane's

"Your papers to prove your identity," Crandall demanded, still in a fog of bewilderment.

"I haven't any, General Crandall," the other replied, with a faint smile, "or your Indian, Jaimihr Khan, would have placed them in your hands after the search of my room yesterday. I've convinced Major Bishop of my genuineness, however, after we left your house and when the moment for action arrived. A cable to Sir Ludlow-Service in the Downing street office will confirm my story. Meanwhile I am willing to go under arrest if you think best."

"But—but I don't understand, captain—er—Cavendish. You posed as a German, as an Englishman."

"Briefly, general, a girl secretly in the pay of the Downing street office—Louisa Schmidt—Josepha, the cigar girl whom you ordered locked up a few hours ago—is the English representative in the Wilhelmstrasse at Berlin. She learned of a plan to get a German spy in your signal tower a month before war was declared, reported it to London, and I was summoned from Khartum to London to play the part of the German spy. At Berlin, where she had gone from your own town of Gibraltar to meet me, she arranged to procure me a number in the Wilhelmstrasse through the agency of a dupe named Capper"—

"Capper! Good Lord!" Crandall stammered.

"With the number I hurried to Alexandria. Woodhouse—Captain Woodhouse, from Wady Halfa—a victim, poor chap, to the necessities of our plan, fell into the hands of the Wilhelmstrasse men there, and I gained possession of his papers. The Germans started him in a robber caravan of Bedouins for the desert, but I provided against his getting far before being rescued, and the German agents there were all rounded up the day I sailed as Woodhouse."

"Make this girl a prisoner!"

"And you came here to save Gibraltar and the fleet from German spies!" Crandall put the question dazedly.

"There were only two, general—Aimer and your servant, Jaimihr. We have them now. You may order the release of Louisa Schmidt."

"The captain has overlooked one other—the most dangerous one of all, General Crandall." Jane stepped up to where the governor stood and threw back her hands with an air of submission. "Her name is Jane Gerson of New York, and she knew all along that this gentleman was deceiving you. She had met him, in fact, three weeks before on a railroad train in France."

The startled eyes of Gibraltar's master looked first at the set features of the man, then to the girl's flushed face. Little lines of humor crinkled about the corners of his mouth.

"Captain Cavendish—or Woodhouse, make this girl a prisoner—your prisoner, sir!"

CHAPTER XXII.

At the Quay.

FIVE o'clock at the quay, and already the new day was being made raucous by the bustle of departure—shouts of porters, tenders' jangling engine bells, thump of trunks dropped down skidways, lamentations of voyagers vainly hunting baggage mislaid. Out in the stream the Saxonia—a clean white ship, veritable ark of refuge for pious Americans escaping the deluge.

In the midst of a group of his countrymen Henry J. Sherman stood, feet wide apart and straw hat cocked back over his bald spot. He was narrating the breathless incidents of the night's dark hour.

"Yes, sir, a soldier comes to our rooms about 3:30 o'clock and hammers on our door. 'Everybody in this hotel's under arrest,' he says. 'Kindly dress as soon as possible and report to Major Bishop in the office.' And we but five hours before the guests of General and Lady Crandall at Government House. What d'you think of that for a quick change?

"Well, gentlemen, we piled downstairs, with me minus a collar button and havin' to hold my collar down behind with my hand. And what do we find? This chap Aimer, with a face like a side of cream cheese, standing in the middle of a bunch of soldiers with guns; another bunch of soldiers surroundin' his Arab boy, who's as innocent a little fellah as ever you set eyes on, and this Major Bishop walkin' up and down, all excited, and sayin' something about somebody's got a scheme to blow up the whole fleet out there. Which might have been done, he says, if it wasn't for that fellah Woodhouse we'd had dinner with just that very evening."

"Who's some sort of spy. I knew it all the time, you see." Mrs. Sherman was quick to claim her share of her fellow tourists' attention. "Only he's a British spy set to watch the Germans. Major Bishop told me that in confidence after it was all over—said he'd never met a man with the nerve this Captain Woodhouse has."

"Better whisper that word 'spy' soft," Henry J. admonished, sotto voce. "We're not out of this plagued Europe yet, and we've had about all the excitement we can stand. Don't want anybody to arrest us again just the minute we're sailin'. But, as I was sayin', there we all stood, foolish as goats, until in comes General Crandall, followed by this Woodhouse chap. 'Excuse me, people, for causin' you this little inconvenience,' the general says. 'Major Bishop has taken his orders too literal. If you'll go back to your rooms and finish dressin' I'll have the army bus down here to take you to the quay. The Hotel Splendide's accommodations have been slightly disarranged by the arrest of its worthy proprietor. So back we go, and—by cricky, mother, here comes the general and Mrs. Crandall now!"

Henry J. broke through the ring of passengers and, with a waving of his hat, rushed to the curb. A limousine bearing the governor, his lady and Jane Gerson and with two bulky hampers strapped to the baggage rack behind was just drawing up.

"Why, of course we're down here to see you off and bid you godspeed to little old Kewanee!" Lady Crandall was quick to anticipate the Shermans' greetings. General Crandall, beaming indulgently on the group of home goers, had a hand for each.

"Yes, yes," he exclaimed, "after arresting you at 3 o'clock we're here to give you a clean ticket at 5. Couldn't do more than that—what? Regrettable occurrence and all that, but give you something to tell the stay at homes about when you get back to—ah"—

"Kewanee, Illynoy, general," Sherman was quick to supply. "No town like it this side the pearly gates."

"No doubt of it, Sherman," Crandall heartily agreed. "A quiet place, I'll wager. Think I'd relish a touch of your Kewanee after—ah—life on Gibraltar."

Jane Gerson, who had been standing in the car, anxiously scanning the milling crowd about the landing stage, caught sight of a white helmet and khaki clad shoulders pushing through the nearer fringes of travelers. She slipped out of the limousine unseen and waited for the white helmet to be doffed before her.

"I was afraid maybe"— the girl began, her cheeks suddenly flaming.

"Afraid that after all it wasn't true?" the man she had found in war's vortex finished, his gray eyes compelling hers to tell him their whole message. "Afraid that Captain Cavendish might be as vile a deceiver as Woodhouse? Does Cavendish have to prove himself all over again, little girl?"

"No, no!" Her hands fluttered into his, and her lips were parted in a smile. "It's Captain Woodhouse I want to know always—the man whose pledged word I held to."

"It must have been hard," he murmured. "But you were splendid—splendid!"

"No, I was not." Tears came to dim her eyes, and the hands he held trembled. "Once—in one terrible moment this morning—when Jaimihr told us you were going to the signal tower—when we waited—waited to hear that awful noise—my faith failed me. I thought you"—

"Forget that moment, Jane, dearest. A saint would have denied faith then."

They were silent for a minute, their hearts quailing before the imminent separation. He spoke:

"Go back to the States now; go back and show this Hildebrand person you're a wonder—a prize. Show him what I've known more and more surely every moment since that meeting in Calais. But give him fair warning. He's going to lose you."

"Lose me?" she echoed.

"Inevitably. Listen, girl! In a year my term of service is up, and if the war's over I shall leave the army, come to the States to you, and—and—do you think I could become a good American?"

"He is going to lose you."

"If—if you have the proper teacher," the girl answered, with a flash of mischief.

"All aboard for the Saxonia!" It was Consul Reynolds, flused, perspiring, overwhelmed with the sense of his duty, who bustled up to where the Shermans were chatting with Lady Crandall and the general. Reynolds' sharp eye caught an intimate tableau on the other side of the auto. "And that means you, Miss Steplively New York," he shouted, "much as I hate to—ah—interrupt."

Jane Gerson saw her two precious hampers slemming a way through the crowd on the backs of porters, bound for the tender's deck. She could not let them out of her sight.

"Well, Jane?" His hands were on her arms and he would not let her go. "Will you be my teacher? I want no other."

"My terms are high." She tried to smile, though trembling lips belied her.

"I'd pay with my life," he whispered in a quick gust of passion. "Here's my promise"—

He took her in his arms, and between them passed the world old pledge of man and girl.

ONE AGAINST SIXTY

HOW PTE. JOHN CHIPMAN KERR WON V.C.

A Graphic Story of the Heroic Act Performed by the Nova Scotia Boy, Who Was the Sixth Canadian to Win the Most Coveted British Military Decoration.

"AN authenticated story of one against sixty odd," is the story just allowed through the censor's hands of how John Chipman Kerr, Canada's sixth and latest V. C. hero, won his Victoria Cross.

Pte. Kerr, the son of a Canadian militia captain and born at Fox River, Nova Scotia, was transferred to a battalion at the front on June 8th, 1916, in the course of the reformation of the Canadian division, and on June 22nd the reorganized battalion went back into the line in the same position in Sanctuary Wood, where they had first suffered. On Sept. 15th they were sent to the chalk pits on the left of Courcelette.

Meantime, the attacking parties had advanced to the capture of Faback Graben, a difficult trench to take, as the men had to go forward in oblique fashion. The centre was taken, and Capt. Harstone rushed his company, Kerr amongst them, to fill the gap, and Fabeck Graben fell. But its taking was not complete. The enemy, in unknown strength, retained possession of a stretch of 200 yards, where he was sandwiched in between different portions of the Canadian force. His hold on this position was strengthened by the fact that he also held in great force Zollern Graben, which adjoined.

This disposition was fraught with great danger to both the opposing troops, neither of which knew the other's strength in men and munitions, but the enemy had the advantage of knowing every inch of the ground, concealed machine guns, and snipers' nests. Capt. Harstone decided on a bombing expedition to oust the enemy from the trench, and he sent word to this effect to the brigadier through his battalion headquarters. The assault, however, had consumed all the bombs, and before the supply could be replenished night had set in.

Meanwhile, an elaborate plan to capture this particular portion of Fabeck Graben and also Zollern Graben was in course of preparation by the staff, but a brigade message gave Captain Harstone an allotted time in which to carry out the bombing expedition.

A squad of a dozen men was detailed under Corporal Patterson to execute this minor operation, and Pte. Kerr was selected for the post of first bayonet man. His duty as such was to precede the party, dispose of the enemy sentry in a manner which would not arouse the whole garrison, seek the latter's whereabouts, and advise the bombers of their target.

Kerr climbed the block, or boundary line, established in the Canadian trench, and made his way toward a similar obstruction erected by the enemy. The other men followed him. The German sentry was alert and hurled a bomb over the parapet. Kerr saw the missile hurtling towards him, and bent his right arm in front of his body the better to protect himself. It was a near call, for the bomb blew off the top of Kerr's forefinger and wounded him in the side. Bombers of both sides then became busy, and neither could see the other nor the effect of their missiles.

Regardless of his wounds and of the enemy, Kerr scrambled to the top of the battered parados. Here he obtained a full view of the enemy. The small attacking party could easily have been overcome by the number of Germans that crowded the trench, but this did not enter into Kerr's calculations.

He had only two bombs with him, and after making excellent use of them he opened fire with his rifle. This, however, had become clogged with mud and jammed. With his bombs expended and his rifle useless he remained at the top of the trench directing the aim of his bombers. Then he seized the rifle of the second bayonet man to make reprisals for his own hurt. He seemed to bear a charmed life, as, though he was in full view, the wild aim of the Germans passed him by.

Under continuous pressure the enemy retired, and as soon as they had rounded the first bay, which hid them from sight, Kerr jumped into the trench and grimly followed. The place was thick with dead and dying Germans. Prepared for German treachery, Kerr rounded the first bay without incident, holding his bayonet fixed. They had retired to the other extremity of the trench.

Kerr discovered this when on rounding the third bay of the trench he came face-to-face with a heavily-built German, who at sight of the bayonet instantly threw up both hands. There stood the wounded Canadian facing, not this one man, but sixty others behind him, in a trench amply provided with ammunition and weapons. He smiled with amusement when one among the sixty waved a white rag at him.

Kerr signalled to the Germans with his rifle to climb over the parados, at the same time calling to his comrades to hurry along as he was in touch with the enemy. The attacking party now numbered only nine, one having been killed and three others in addition to Kerr wounded.

When the other eight Canadians came on the scene the opposing forces were roughly seven to one in favor of the enemy. Zollern Graben was close at hand, and the Germans had a plentiful stock of munitions, including a machine gun, yet they refused to make one last bid for their freedom.

Instead, they followed the pointed instructions of their captor and made their submissive way down a communication trench into captivity, while Pte. Kerr proceeded to the dressing station, hence to the base and across the channel to England, oblivious of the fact that he had been recommended for the Victoria Cross.

Pte. Kerr is described as a typical specimen of the best Canadian manhood—over six feet tall in his socks and an open air advocate. When war came he was homesteading at Spirit River, Alta., and as there were no recruiting sergeants there he, with a dozen other ranchers, walked in fifty miles to the railway and booked passage for the 300-mile trip to Edmonton. Here they enlisted, reaching England in April, 1916.

WANTS LUMBER BUSINESS.

Good Results From Campaign in British Columbia.

British Columbia is making a bold bid for Ontario and Eastern Canadian lumber business, and the chances are that Douglas fir will oust southern pine from his place in the "affection" of eastern Canadian architects and writers of building specifications.

After a cursory investigation of the lumber market, an energetic campaign was decided upon. A lumber commissioner was appointed and located in Toronto. The duty of this official is to confer with architects, engineers, and users of wood in general—not particularly for the lumber trade—to woo them away from their southern instincts, and develop a liking for the British Columbia output.

Many good results have accrued. The British Columbia lumber commissioner in Toronto has in many instances been able to assure users of lumber in this Province of the efficacy of Douglas fir, which, heretofore, so it is claimed, has been more or less discriminated against in the city by-laws.

One report states that: "It was found that city by-laws, where they existed, uniformly gave preference to southern pine. For instance, Toronto allowed a fibre stress for Douglas fir of only 1,200 lb. per square inch, as against 1,440 lb. for southern pine, which meant that the southern pine had a 25 per cent. advantage over Douglas fir. After repeated and persistent endeavor Toronto now admits Douglas fir and southern pine on an even basis. This is particularly important, because in Ontario the standard for Toronto is usually followed by other cities and municipalities."

It is now claimed that the fact that shipments east from British Columbia have doubled during the past year, the policy of establishing the office in Toronto has been vindicated.

On the Peace River.

We launched our craft Necessity, placed our belongings, well tied up in the balloon-silk tent, upon it, and, after I had taken two pictures, pushed off into the current. In our hurry we left one of our bags of dried meat which we had lugged so far, lying upon the beach—to the great joy, no doubt, of some lynx, coyote, or bear.

The ride that followed was decidedly the most exhilarating it has ever been my good fortune to enjoy. We were almost immediately in rough water, and, past the first bend, we were caught by a whirlpool that spun us wildly about in a way that reminded me of the ditty:

"Swing me around again, Willie,
Don't let my feet touch the ground!"

By dint of desperate poling we got into the current again and went careering madly along between the steep rock walls. In some places we were able to find pole bottom and keep our craft reasonably straight; where the poles would not reach we used some rude sweeps that we had made by nailing blocks of wood to short poles. Our great concern, of course, was not to hit a rock, of which there were many, for we knew that the raft was too frail to stand much pounding and would easily go to pieces. Our plight in case it had done so would not have been enviable, for even this high up the Finlay is a big river, there were few landing places, and Joe, though an old riverman, could not swim.

Luckily the water was wonderfully clear, so that we could see dangers remarkably well; in fact, it was so clear that repeatedly we thought ourselves in danger from rocks that really lay far below the surface. We could only travel as fast as the current, but that carried us along at racing speed, and as we swept over the clear depths we again felt, as on Crooked River, the sensation of flying. The play of light on the gorgeously colored boulders which formed the bottom added greatly to the pleasure and novelty of the ride.—From "On the Headwaters of Peace River," by Paul L. Haworth, in Scribner.

Shipbuilding in N. S.

The S.S. War Wasp, the first steel ocean-going steamer built in Nova Scotia, was successfully launched recently by the Nova Scotia Steel Company. Work on this vessel was commenced in October last. The boat has a carrying capacity of about 2,000 tons, a displacement when loaded of 3,610 tons and a speed of eleven knots per hour. The dimensions are as follows: Length, between perpendiculars, 220 feet; moulded depth, 20 feet, and beam, 36 feet.

The War Wasp has been sold to the British Government. A second vessel, about 20 per cent. larger, is under construction, and a third vessel will occupy the berth vacated by the War Wasp.

A Growing Industry.

Canada now has a total of [illegible] pulp and paper mills, many of which are large and of modern design. The export figures for the calendar year 1916 show that pulpwood, wood pulp, and paper produced have increased in value to nearly [illegible], or about half of the total export value of forest products, with the exception of the small proportion of specially manufactured articles.

PAINTED A ROAD.

How French Artists Fooled the German Aviators.

A friend writes me from Paris that one day, while driving through the forest of Saint Germain, he came upon a convoy going to the front—six big 155-mm. guns "dragged by motors and all the personnel and ammunition tractioned by motor also, but automobiles of such very strange aspect. They were painted in chromes and greens and blues and purples to represent rocks and trees and leaves and shrubs, like scenery, so as to be completely dissimulated from the enemy. My companion said, 'Regarding comme ils sont bien camouflés,' and I said, 'Well, I am glad that at last they are making use of the talent of the painters in a practical way.'"

Last summer, just after the battle of the Somme, this same friend met a man he knew, the head of one of the great designing houses of Paris, wearing his uniform and proudly displaying on his breast his croix de guerre avec palmes, the highest military honor. 'You are back on leave?' he asked. "Yes and no," was the reply. "I am at present on post near Paris. I am camoufleur."

Then he told some stories of the camouflage, among them this one:

Just before the attack on the Somme the German aviators were very active and made it difficult, except at night, to move large bodies of troops to the front. One road especially, leading from a small forest but lying straight and white over the fields, was closely watched. It became most important to get some big guns and many men over this road and into position by the 1st of July. So the camoufleurs got very busy and painted "three kilometres of white roadway bordered with green, and when the enemy aviators arose to reconnoitre they reported 'nothing moving on the road from Amiens,' while all day long, for five long days, a continuous line of artillery and thousands of troops passed under the painted roadway to take their assigned places for the great attack. So you see that we painters are worth something, after all, and that this canvas was the result of genie as well as genius!"—From "Special Service for Artists in War Time," by Ernest Peixotto, in the Scribner.

Frenzied Hindenburgers.

"Hindenburg Peace" advocates—the Pan-Germans and Prussian militarists who are clamoring for annexations and indemnities—have now started a door-to-door canvass to popularize their wild views. They are distributing circulars in the streets, depositing them at the doors of houses and flats, and even having them folded into the newspapers. One of these documents has reached The London Daily Mail from a neutral source.

Headed "Appeal to German Men and Women!" it starts with a frenzied "admonition" to remember what Germany's enemies have in pickle for a defeated Fatherland. "Besides great tracts of German territory the foe wants a war indemnity of £100,000,000 a year, in order to make us tributary to him for a century. In addition, he wants German mines and German factories to supply him with their products free of charge and to enslave the German working classes for his own enrichment. Think of it! Before the war the German imperial debt amounted to only £3 15s per head. If Germany accepts a peace without annexations and indemnities the debt will amount to £125 per head, while the tax burden of every citizen will be quintupled!"

Using Waste Fruit.

An important work being done by the women of Canada is the canning of waste fruits. The Red Cross canning factory, as one of these places is known, gathers in all the waste fruit that can be found, and jellies of all kinds are made and sent to the soldiers in France and England. This season our boys should get a large amount of fruit canned by the Canadian women and if the fruit is plentiful the Tommies and Sammies will be happy.

Last season one factory used 10,000 tons of sugar in the jellies made for the boys at the front. The fruit was gathered by volunteers and the apples were peeled by society women, some of them working all night during the busy season. All the work was done by volunteers. The money for the sugar and the cans and glasses was donated and the freight charges were very small.

Windfalls were plentiful last fall and as soon as the farmer reported that apples were going to waste a corps of volunteer workers was enlisted and the apples were brought to the canning factory.

Apples are used for the base of all the jelly and many flavors are added. Most of the apples used for the jelly were no good for marketing. When the first lot was received at the hospitals in France and England there was great rejoicing among the wounded soldiers.

A New Title.

The title of Dame, which has lately been revived in connection with the admission of women to a new order in England, was not well received in Scotland when it was first used in connection with the Primrose League. It is on record that in one village "habitation," when an influential visitor referred to a certain member as Dame, the member thus addressed repudiated the idea with energy. "Dame, indeed!" she exclaimed. "Did ye ever hear the like. I'm sure I'm nae auld'er than her. I min' as a wee lassie she was a muckle lumpie gaun tae the schule."

The Cuckoo Bee.

The cuckoo bee is so called because, like the cuckoo, it lays its eggs in the cells or nests of other bees. All the many species have [illegible] gaily colored bodies [illegible] hostile nests and emit a [illegible].

FLOWER SHOW A SUCCESS

Flowers Were Particularly Good This Year—Nice Sum Raised for Hospital by Sale of Blooms

The Flower Show held last Friday evening under the auspices of the Horticultural Society was the best on record. The display of blooms was quite what might be expected from the luxuriant growth this season. Excellent music was furnished by an orchestra composed of Miss Gloria, C. R. Robinson, and Mr. Harlan. The sum of $ was realized for the Hospital by the sale of flowers and vegetables. The list of prize winners follows:—

Sweet Peas—1st Mrs. J. Lambertus, 2nd Miss Stead.

Asters 1st Mrs. Stead, 2nd C. W. Cryderman.

Nasturtiums 1st Mrs. James Tolton, 2nd Mrs. Weltlaufer.

Gladioli—1st D. McKechnie, 2nd H. M. Norrish.

Pansies 1st Mrs. Stead, 2nd Mrs. W. Webber.

Fate is Confirmed

ALVIN E. WILTON

A telegram received by Mr. Ivan Wilton on Monday from Ottawa stated that his gallant soldier son, Alvin, who was reported "missing and believed killed" on Jan. 5th, 1917, is now officially reported killed in action.

FOOD CONTROLLER'S ADVICE

Following are suggestions put forth by Hon. W. J. Hanna, Canadian Food Controller:

1. Use perishable foods. Save potatoes which has been produced so abundantly this summer. Preserve, dry, can and store.
2. Eat more fish.
3. Substitute other cereals for wheat products—cornmeal, buckwheat flour, rice flour, and above all oatmeal.
4. Don't throw good food into the garbage can. $50,000,000 is wasted every year in this country by carelessness in the kitchens.
5. Preach once more the good old fashioned gospel of the clean plate. Do not let children waste food at their meals. Do not waste it yourself.
6. Organize. Various women's organizations are already active. Their leaders will tell you what to do. Get in touch with the workers in your own district.

EXPRESSION OF THANKS

Editor Telescope,
Walkerton, Ont.

Dear Sir:

I would like to take this opportunity of publicly thanking the members of the orchestra who so willingly and generously gave their time, at the expense of personal inconvenience, in playing such beautiful selections at the reception to the returned soldiers on Tuesday the 14th inst., and also for their valuable assistance on previous occasions.

I also wish to thank the ladies and gentlemen who have given their assistance on these occasions in rendering solos and recitations thereby contributing greatly to the success of the receptions.

I am,
Yours faithfully
H. Perdue
Sec.-Treas. P. L.

Killed In Action

CAPT. ERIC ROBERTSON

A telegram received by Mr. Norman Robertson on Monday stated that his son Capt. Eric Robertson, R. F. C., who had been missing since July 12th is officially reported killed in action. Eric's machine was hit by an anti-aircraft gun as he led a formation of British planes and went down out of control from 13,000 feet. It is just expressing a simple fact to say that no finer young man has ever left Walkerton than the gallant flight commander who gave his life cheerfully for his Country.

PATRIOTIC GARDEN PARTY

Drew a Large Crowd on Tuesday Evening, Swelling Local P. L.'s receipts by Three Hundred Dollars.

The effort of the local committee of the Bruce Preparedness League met with a good response on Tuesday night when upwards of a thousand people gathered at the Armoury lawn for the big Garden Party. The great marquee tent, where refreshments were served at small tables, was constantly crowded, and it is not surprising that the receipts totalled about $300. Expenses will be comparatively small as most of the refreshments were donated by the ladies of the town and countryside. The elaborate preparations were well carried out by the committee who deserve great praise for their work. The Hanover Band was present and discoursed excellent music. At a rather late hour speech making was begun on the terrace at the south side of the lawn.

Hon. D. Jamieson of Durham, Speaker of the Ontario Legislature, W. D. Cargill M. P. P., President of the Bruce Preparedness League; Dr. Wilson of Mildmay, Mr. John Rowland, Mr. John Purvis, Conservative Nominee for East Bruce, were the speakers. All spoke in a patriotic strain, urging the importance of Canada's putting forth her greatest effort to help the Allies to victory. All the speakers being old Conservative campaigners, it did remind one a bit of election times and one of the speakers apparently had this in mind when he referred to the "peculiarity of his position."

One of the best things on the programme was a speech by Master Charlie James, "Carry On," in which he told of the efforts of himself and his young brother to "do their bit" in the garden at home to help win the war while their father and brother are overseas.

The grounds were brilliantly illuminated with lights, furnished free of charge by the local power company, and certainly added to the attractiveness of the scene.

The speakers paid warm compliments to the local branch of the Preparedness League and its live wire chairman, Mr. John Rowland.

A beautiful embroidered tea cloth made by Mrs. Porter was drawn by A. J. Bennett who contributed it to swell the Patriotic funds. It was then sold at auction by Auctioneer Purvis to John Rowland for $5.

A Haunt of Legend and Romance

Digby Basin and Long Pier, Nova Scotia.

PARRSBORO shore with its rock bound coast of lofty crags and high walled jagged islands washed by mighty tides, the scene of Indian legends and the struggles between the French and English, and the residence of a more modern race of hardy voyageurs, is a name little known to the tourist but one that has an ineffable charm for him who has visited this nook of Nova Scotia.

This was the home of Glooscap, mighty god of the Micmacs. Here one finds the Five Islands, lofty and unexplained islets in the Basin of Minas, pebbles dropped by the mighty Glooscap so says the folk lore of the simple Redman. Attracted by their isolation, it is believed that Capt. Kidd, the infamous and successful pirate, buried here his treasure trove; and many are the deep yawning holes to be seen in these wild and eerie islands where the bold have braved the guarding spirits of the dead pirate chieftain to find out this gold and jewels, bathed in the blood of gentle women and brave men.

Spencers Island, the Indians tell you, was formed when Glooscap overturned his melting pot; and the smaller islands near by are not common islands—they are Glooscap's dogs turned to stone as guardians of their master's melting pot. Many are the Indians still to be found here and they believe that some day the great spirit of Glooscap will return to them; and then his chosen people will again rule over the land.

And here is Partridge Island—like lordly Blomidon opposite, rich in the beautiful amethyst—once the home of Kitpooseagunow, the mightiest fisherman of the Micmac legendary heroes. He it was who embarked in his huge stone canoe, harpooned the whale, tossed it into his craft as if it were a trout; and when he landed, he it was who split the leviathan of the deep with one blow of his great stone knife, tossed one half to Glooscap, and himself ate the other.

A Nova Scotia limousine.

It was from the lofty cliffs of Partridge Island that a French warrior pursued by the English, leaped to his death on the rocks hundreds of feet below. And later, it was here a blockhouse was placed when England feared the raids of Yankee privateers in the stirring days of 1812.

With such traditions, little wonder is it that here was developed a hardy sea faring folk. Sometimes the wife and her children accompanied the sea captain as he sailed his tiny schooner to the four quarters of the earth; but more often, he sailed away alone and for months the mother reared his children alone and superintended the farm.

Here one finds beautiful farms, thick forests, save for here and there a clearing where one can get a view of the magnificent sweep of the Basin of Minas, of the islands of Blomidon and of the shores ten miles across the sea of silver, shores dotted with orchards and the white spots of the farm buildings.

Men who have travelled the world over have come to Nova Scotia and declared the scenery along the Basin of Minas the fairest of it all, have marvelled at the mighty surge of those wonderful tides with their unique rise and fall of sixty feet, and have spent their summers in its cool, invigorating climate. A comfortable steamboat service operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway connects St. John, New Brunswick, with this land of legends bold and noble mountains and with the land of Evangeline.

READY FOR REPUBLIC.

All Classes in Russia Are Prepared, Says Raymond Recouly.

A last point to which I wish to call attention is that from the first hour of the revolution the republican idea made extraordinary progress in the minds of all classes. I live among Russians, and could therefore watch its growth day by day. Men of letters and men of business, merchants, financiers, lawyers, professors—I saw them, one after another, come to the same way of thinking. For the first weeks it seemed impossible to many of a conservative turn of mind that there should be a Russian republic. They said, 'Our country is not ripe for one. Think of all the hard experiences which you French went through before the republic was really at home in France, and yet your people are highly developed, while ours are not,' and so on. These same men have now come round, little by little, to the republican idea. The reason is that any other form of government would present many difficulties, if, indeed, it is not impossible. The Romanoff dynasty is discredited, to say the least; it is not conceivable that it should be reinstated, and there are no other available aspirants to the throne, even supposing that the nation wished to return to a monarchy. Anyone who feels inclined to pronounce judgment upon the Russian revolution should bear this in mind: the old regime was so detestable that any new one, even if far from perfect, cannot be worse. From the military point of view, which is, of course, what is most interesting to Russia's allies, the former system, or want of it, had so disorganized the whole country that it was becoming more and more difficult to carry on the war. It is hard to see how either the Russians or we of the Allies can suffer by the change, because what has been thrown away was absolutely worthless. That should always be in our minds when we are inclined to criticise Russia, in order that we may keep our proper mental perspective and see things as they really are.—Raymond Recouly in Scribner.

A Forbidden Tongue.

"Ukrainian differs from Great Russian fully as much as Dutch does from German. In fact, the highest learned body in the Russian Empire, the Petrograd Imperial Academy, admitted a few years ago that the Ukrainians possessed a distinct language and culture of their own. That, however, was not the Russian Government's view of the matter. 'There never has been, is not, and never will be an Ukrainian language or nationality,' declared a Russian Minister of State in 1863, and this was merely the formal expression of what generations of Russian bureaucrats had already considered as axiomatic. All official business was carried on in Russian, a language almost completely unintelligible to Ukrainians; all Ukrainian writings save certain old books of devotion were rigidly proscribed, and Ukrainian education was so strictly prohibited that in many parts of the Russian Ukraine even today there are fewer schools than there were two centuries ago. The only way for a talented Ukrainian to spring his ideas was in Russian, and many of the greatest names in Russian literature, such as Gogol, Kostomaroff, etc., were really Ukrainians forced to employ this alien tongue. What happened to those who dared clothe their thoughts in the native idiom may be judged by the terrible fate of that greatest of all Ukrainian poets, Taras Shevchenko. For the abominable crime of having composed some exquisite little verses celebrating the natural beauties of his Ukrainian homeland, this youthful genius was sentenced to ten years' penal servitude in Siberia, and returned from his hell of suffering a broken, prematurely old man, only to die."—T. Lothrop Stoddard, in The Century.

Real Democracy.

General Baillaud, commanding part of the French expeditionary force in the Balkans, is so popular with his men that nearly every good story originating in his corps is either about him or attributed to him. The latest anecdote going the rounds tells how a soldier of the rough and ready style was returning to quarters near Monastir with a water jug in each hand. Coming across another mud-stained "poilu" sitting beside the road, he hailed him:

"Hello, old man."

"Hello," replied the other.

"Say, can't you carry one of these jugs for me?"

"Sure," and they went on together.

"Would you believe it," said the first soldier, "they've chucked me into the grade of corporal."

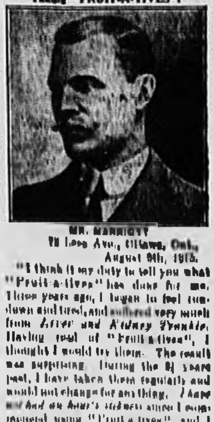
"What of that," replied the other, "didn't they chuck me into the grade of general?"

After nearly dropping his jug, the soldier drew closer and made out three faint stars on a mud-stained sleeve. He drew himself up at attention and saluted.

"Walk on, corporal," said General Baillaud, who wouldn't consent to give up his jug.

Douglas Fir Masts.

Specifications have been issued by the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation for the spars and masts for the wooden vessels which are to be built on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts for the United States Government. These spars and masts are all to be of Douglas fir. Each vessel will be equipped with a foremast, a mainmast, and eight cargo booms. The foremast will be 72 feet 6 inches long, 5 inches in diameter at the top, 15 inches in diameter at the heel, and a maximum diameter of 13 inches. The mainmast will be 66 feet long. The booms will be 42 feet long, 8 inches in diameter at the top, 12 inches mid diameter, and 10 inches in diameter at the base. It is expected that 800 of the larger size and 2,400 booms will be required.



THE BLESSING OF A HEALTHY BODY

Has Not Had An Hour's Sickness Since Taking "FRUIT-A-TIVES".

MR. MARRIOTT
19 Lees Ave., Ottawa, Ont.,
August 9th, 1915.

"I think it my duty to tell you what "Fruit-a-tives" has done for me. Three years ago, I began to feel rundown and tired, and suffered very much from Liver and Kidney Trouble. Having read of "Fruit-a-tives", I thought I would try them. The result was surprising. During the 3 years past, I have taken them regularly and would not change for anything. I have not had an hour's sickness since I commenced using "Fruit-a-tives", and I know now what I haven't known for a good many years—that is, the blessing of a healthy body and clear thinking brain".

WALTER J. MARRIOTT.

Silos In Western Canada

Up-to-date Silo and Barn in the West.

FOR many years Western Canada has not been thought of as a silo country. The enormous stretches of unoccupied land on which cattle roamed at will, on which settler cut his year's supply of native hay, to a large extent met the fodder problems of the country. With closer settlement and more intensified agriculture, however, a change is coming about. Particularly on account of the rapid advance of the dairy industry the farmers are becoming more interested in the various means of caring for their herds, especially during the winter months. The silo has been found to solve one problem, and is making its appearance in many parts of the country.

From experiments that have been undertaken at the various experimental farms it seems evident that the silo method of feeding dairy stock is one of the [illegible]. Superintendent G. H. Hutton of the Dominion Experimental Farm at Lacombe, Alberta, states that silage is one of the best means of keeping the farm stock well fed during the winter and has solved the problem of securing succulent feed for the dairy cattle.

In his report Mr Hutton says that the growing of roots has met with many objections among them being the high cost of labor and the difficulty of storing. Where these difficulties can be overcome roots add very materially to the ration, for the dairy cow and are a means whereby the milk production can be increased in its first flow after freshening and maintained at a higher daily average throughout the winter. [illegible] showing also a saving in the cost of producing one pound of butter of as much as four cents per pound, and as much as seven cents per pound with silage made from corn.

Albania, the New Nation, Possesses Long History, But Was Almost Unknown

MORE than a hundred years ago, Gibbon wrote of Albania that it was a "country, within sight of Italy, which is less known than the interior of America." Such a comparison would not, to-day, label Albania as quite a terra incognita, but very nearly all that Gibbon meant to convey by it is still true enough. There have been people, like Miss Durham, for instance, who have made notable excursions through Albania, but the very fact that such excursions are regarded as notable is but a further illustration of how little the world knows of the country. And yet it is one of the "oldest countries in the world," and its people have been strangely free from the revolutionary changes which have swept over practically every other nation in Europe.

As to the origin of the people of "the white uplands," no one can speak with any certainty. About as much or as little is known about the origin of the Albanians as is known about the origin of the Basques of the Pyrenees. The little that is known of their country shows that they were influenced by Greek civilization, then by Roman civilization; whilst, from the fifth century onwards, it is possible, from the outside, at any rate, to scan their history without any serious break. The more that is known of this history the more astonishing does it appear that the people should have preserved their national characteristics to the remarkable extent that they have done. It is one long story of invasion, and again invasion. First the Goths, in the fourth and fifth centuries; then the Serbo-Croats, then the Bulgarians, each in turn establishing their rule over the country. Then, in the eleventh century, came the inevitable Norman in the person of Robert Guiscard. Robert had surrounded himself with the usual band of soldiers of fortune, and he possessed himself of Durazzo; whilst his son, Bohemud, defeated the Greeks, who then held sway over the country in several battles. Finally, however, having lost Durazzo through treachery, and failing to regain it, Bohemud retired to Italy. Thereafter, Southern Albania and Epirus remained under Byzantine domination until 1204, when, after the capture of Constantinople by the Crusaders, Michael Comnenus, a member of the imperial family, retired to Epirus, and founded there an independent sovereignty known as the Despotate of Epirus. Meanwhile, the rest of Albania passed into the hands of the Sicilian kings and the house of Anjou, who called their possessions the Kingdom of Albania, and waged unremitting warfare on the Byzantine emperors. Then, in the middle of the fourteenth century, came that wonderful, though short-lived, period of Serbian ascendancy under Stefan Dushan, who included all Albania in his empire, and took the title of Emperor of the Greeks, Slavs, and Albanians. It was after the break-up of Dushan's empire, which took place about 1358, that the Albania, as it exists to-day, began to emerge, the Albania ruled by many chiefs, great and small, who recognised no authority above their own, and who neither sought nor encouraged anything in the nature of national cohesion. Only once did the Albanians combine themselves for a common purpose, and that was when, under the famous George Kastriot, they arose to resist the oncoming Turk, in the Fifteenth Century. Ultimately, the Turks, under Muhammed II., succeeded in securing the submission of the country; but the Albanian was never really conquered. Turkish authority was always most nominal, and any attempt on the part of Constantinople to enforce it invariably produced widespread revolt.

Many of the chieftains, indeed, maintained almost complete independence. This was notably so in the case of Ali Pasha of Tepelen, the Lion of Janina, in the early part of the last century. Having subdued all his neighbors, he ruled undisputed over a territory stretching from the Adriatic to the Ægean, and maintained direct relations with foreign powers. Ali Pasha was overthrown in 1822, but the spirit of independence which he embodied remained amongst the Albanian chieftains quite unimpaired. The efforts of the European powers, since the close of the second Balkan war, to weld the country into some semblance of national unity are too well known to need recounting. It used to be said of the Albanian that he had but two ambitions: one to possess a rifle, and the other not to pay taxes. This would still seem to be a fairly just summing up of his character.

An Odd Egg.

One of the most curious of nature's inventions is that of an egg that can't roll off a shelf. It is absolutely important to a certain species of seabird—the murre. This feathered creature builds no nest, but lays its eggs on narrow shelves of precipitous rocks. Ordinary eggs—those of the domestic hen, for example, if deposited in such places, would be liable to roll off and smash. But the murre's egg is of such a shape that if disturbed it simply rolls in a circle. Such being the case, the female murre experiences no anxiety. She could incubate her [illegible] on an ordinary mantelpiece and be satisfied of their safety.

The Onion Harvest.

The gardeners, who planted "dutch setts" last spring, are busy pulling up the onions this week, and every available boy has been commandeered for the harvest. It is a great harvest too, for the onions never came up better than they did this season. The only trouble is with grass and weeds. These grew along with the onions during the wet season, and there was no chance to get weeding done. However, the onions are there all right, and, with favorable weather for drying, the growers should get good returns.

WASTE OF FOODSTUFFS

Do not waste a slice of bread. There is an old saying, "Many mickles mak' a muckle," and, if there are many individual savings the total gain will be great. Do not be too proud to notice whether anything usable is being wasted; do not be too proud to use odds and ends which might, otherwise, be cast into the garbage can. In Chicago, recently, the garbage was reduced from 400 loads a day to 200 loads a day, due largely to the preachments of economy. Economy in the use of foodstuffs should be practised by those who live in the country as well as by those who dwell in the towns and cities. Get the real vision of economy and put it into daily practice. Every individual must realize the food shortage in all its magnitude and he must realize what want and famine would mean and then he must put forth every effort to prevent it. Do not leave it to the other fellow. Do Your Part. In this matter prevention is a thousand times better than cure. Eliminate all waste in your household.

Labor Conditions Following The War

ONE of the most serious problems which Canada must face at the close of the war is the rearrangement of our affairs upon the basis of normal civil life, with the incidental question of labor unemployment.

Labor conditions in Canada to-day are, in many respects, very similar to those which prevailed in the United States during their Civil War and the re-construction period. Our labor conditions immediately previous to the war had the same chaotic aspect. The start of the war first brought depression in industry, followed by a rapid return in the demand for labor as manufacture of munitions and other war supplies extended, and to-day in Canada there is little if any unemployment and skilled labor is in strong demand.

At the close of the Civil War, the United States had a population of about 33,000,000. The Union Army at the time of Lee's surrender numbered slightly more than 1,000,000. It was estimated that another million men and women were employed in the Northern States in the manufacture of munitions. During the four year period of the Civil War, immigration had fallen off, and recruiting had depleted the workers on the farms, and drawn largely from the laboring classes in the cities. The call for munition workers was supplied from other branches of industry, with the result that ordinary enterprises were compelled to run short-handed or pay a high premium for labor.

Compared with this situation, we find Canada's army of about 400,000 drawn from a population of about 8,000,000. It is estimated that some 300,000 men and women are now engaged in munition work. Only 12% of our army, however, has been enlisted from the farms and more than half of the total has been recruited from among the skilled and manual laborers. The comparison shows the same situation regarding the scarcity of labor for ordinary enterprises, because of the drain through the army for overseas forces and munition workers.

During the Civil War period, wages gradually increased. Prices of commodities also advanced. The laborer, however, skilled or unskilled, was placed at a disadvantage because his wages did not advance in proportion to the prices of necessities. Even with this situation, conditions were better among the mechanics and trades than among the clerks and salaried people, whose incomes did not advance in proportion to the increased price of living.

When the Union Army started to muster out in 1865 at the rate of about 300,000 per month for the three summer months, there was for a time a glut of the labor market. This was but temporary, however, as 1866 witnessed an active industrial and agricultural revival. The returning soldiers, a large percentage of whom had volunteered from the farming districts, went back to producing or migrated to the homestead lands in the newly opened Mississippi Valley States. This wholesale homesteading brought demands for new railways; more than 15,000 miles of rails were laid in the west during the five years directly following the war. This railway work took up quantities of labor from the eastern centres and assisted to a marked degree the settlers who had gone into the new country without sufficient funds to aide them through the breaking and growing seasons of the first years.

The first annual report of the United States Commissioner of Labor published in 1886, summarizes the re-construction period, as follows:

"The year 1867 can hardly be called one of financial panics or industrial depressions, although hard times apparently prevailed. The stimulation to all industries resulting from the war, the speculative enterprises undertaken, the extension of credits, and the slackening of production, necessarily caused a reaction, and a consequent stagnation of business; but the period was hardly spoken of by business men as one of any particular hardship. People for a while began to be conservative, but the impetus gained during the war could not be overcome, and it was not until the crash of 1873 that the effects of undue excitement in all branches of trade and business were thoroughly noticed."

The five years following the Civil War saw the organization of the first labor unions. These had been started in a local way during the last two years of the war. In 1866 the first National Congress of Labor met at Baltimore. The slogan of the labor organizers of the period was the necessity for organization so as to protect American labor against invading foreigners, who were immigrating in large numbers during the five years following the war.

The plants established for the manufacture of munitions for the Northern Army during the war marked the beginning of the factory system, and the centralization of industry in the larger cities. A continuation of this system after the war had a further influence in bringing about labor organizations.

Canada has, since the opening of the war, increased her manufacture of staples and reduced her imports. Industry has been given an impetus that should mark a great era of development. We have demonstrated that many new lines can be profitably manufactured in Canada. We face the same dangers, however, that culminated in the crash of 1873 in the United States—the danger of speculation and over-production, without properly developed markets.

A general survey of the labor situation in Canada indicates that about 150,000 more men will be required after the war than are now employed in Canada. This would about take care of the proportion of returning soldiers which will require employment after the war. The problem then arises as to what we will do with our munition workers—an estimated detail of about 300,000 being employed in this work at present, fully 75% of which number will be called upon to find other employment when the war is over.

We will also have the problem of finding employment for those immigrants seeking work, because it will be difficult to restrict immigration to those who wish to engage in agriculture. Our greatest need to-day is more farmers and greater agricultural production, as will readily be recognized from the fact that our population is half urban and we consume more than we produce. There will be great opportunity and a crying need for farmers and farm laborers all through Canada after the war, but unless proper governmental plan is worked out to direct our immigration into that channel, we face the danger of a flood of unemployed in our cities and towns, while our farms remain undeveloped.

Next in importance to the problem of increased agricultural production is that of the development of our vast natural resources through the extension of existing and promotion of new industries. We must replace the munition plants by utilizing them in extending our present lines of manufacture and promoting the introduction of new lines. Canada should prepare for increased participation in export trade after the war and should grasp the opportunity now to extend in every possible way her industrial development to enable the opportunity to be taken advantage of.

The problem of capital is always closely related to that of labor. Statistics show that Canada has always been able to absorb immigration in direct proportion to the amount of foreign capital it has been able to secure. It is estimated that during the six years preceding the war, Great Britain invested $1,500,000,000 in Canada. After the war, the Mother Country will have her own financial problems to solve and we will be compelled to look elsewhere for our capital. So far we have been able to obtain large sums from the United States and they will probably be willing to be our bankers after the war. They have the money—and it should be only necessary to educate them as to our resources and opportunities; when we will be able to obtain the capital we require.

Available information shows that more than one-half of our overseas forces were recruited from among skilled workers. Some plan must be put into operation for returning these men to civil life gradually so that they will not glut the labor market; otherwise we can count upon serious labor congestion at many points. If, on the other hand, we begin to grapple with these future conditions; to employ every effort of our governmental, financial and commercial organizations to handle the problems of re-organizing our industrial life, Canada will be able to grow by great strides and occupy a prominent place among the nations of the world.

New Bridge at Formosa

The Carrick Council stands a good chance of being let in for the expense of a new bridge at Weiler's mill at Formosa. The west abutment was pretty badly decayed, and a concrete abutment was opened, however, it nearly collapsed, and the Reeve was called to look it over. As a result of his visit, it is likely that a new concrete bridge will be constructed.—Mildmay Gazette.

Lesson X.—Third Quarter, For Sept. 2, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, Ezek. xxxiv, 11-16, 23-27—Memory Verse, 12—Golden Text, Ps. xxiii, 1—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

A better title for this lesson rather than the one given would be "The Shepherd of a Restored Israel," for it is the record of a time yet future when they shall never again be a prey to the nations (verses 27-31), when the King of Israel, the Lord, shall be in the midst of them and they shall not see evil any more (Zeph. iii, 14, 15). Then shall the twelve tribes be one nation in their own land, and one King shall be King to them all, and they shall never again be divided into two kingdoms, and God shall make with them an everlasting covenant of peace and dwell in their midst forevermore (Ezek. xxxvii, 15-28). There are still those who say and teach that God is done with Israel as a nation because of all their sins, but such people must be wholly deaf to the words of the Lord in Jer. xxxi, 35-37; xxxiii, 23-26, where He says that until sun, moon and stars cease to shine He will never cast off His people Israel, notwithstanding all that they have done. The testimony of the Spirit through Paul is just the same in Rom. xi, 1, 2, 26-27. They are the only nation that God ever chose specially for Himself and called the everlasting nation (which is the literal translation of two Hebrew words in Isa. xliv, 7, given in the A. V. as the ancient people). They will be the first righteous nation on earth, and then will many nations be joined to the Lord and the earth be filled with His glory (Isa. lx, 1-3, 21, 22; xxvii, 6; Zech. ii, 10-13). Our lesson is one of the greatest shepherd chapters in the Old Testament, but Jer. xxiii is another, and there we read that when the King, the Righteous Branch, shall have been raised up unto David the deliverance of Israel from all nations will be so great and wonderful that their coming out of Egypt shall not seem anything to be compared with it (Jer. xxiii, 5-8). The title "Shepherd of Israel" takes us back to Gen. xlix, 24, and on to Ps. lxxx, 1, and Isa. xl, 11, and Rev. vii, 17, and only in the glorious future will our precious Ps. xxiii have its complete fulfillment.

Many cannot see in the lesson of to-day anything more than the Good Shepherd who saves us as individuals and keeps us and cares for us in every way and carries us in His arms and on His shoulders; the Great Shepherd who lives His life in us and the Chief Shepherd who will reward us at His appearing (John x; Heb. xiii; I Pet. v), and we must see and know Him as such before we can see and know Him as the future Shepherd of Israel. It is strange, indeed, that so many believers, truly saved people, have no heart for the things of His kingdom; so many preachers take no interest in Daniel or Revelation or any prophecy, and as one recently said, "If I can get my people saved and safely to heaven I do not need to bother with the things of Daniel and Revelation, which I cannot understand." Is it not a possibility that to such our Lord might say what He said to the two on the way to Emmaus, "O fools, and slow of heart, to believe all that the prophets have spoken!" (Luke xxiv, 25.)

In the days of Jeremiah and Ezekiel there were those who were more interested in the welfare of themselves than of others, who ran without being sent by the Lord, who spoke lies out of the deceit of their own hearts and caused the people to err by their lies and their lightness (Ezek. xxxiv, 2, 8, 10; Jer. xxiii, 16, 17, 21, 25, 26, 32). It is possible that there are still such false prophets, and the Lord will reckon with them in due time, for He is against them, and the reckoning will be a very serious matter for them. Every true prophet or teacher should be the Lord's messenger with the Lord's message, and His word to them is, "Hear the word of the Lord, hear the word at My mouth and give them warning from me" (Hag. i, 13; Ezek. xxxiv, 7, 9; iii, 4, 17). To all such the comfort is that His word will never fail to accomplish His pleasure, and He will watch over it to perform it (Isa. lv, 11; Jer. i, 12, R. V.). Let us always remember that, while in all the Bible there are words for each individual heart, when God says Israel He means Israel, the descendants of Jacob, who was called Israel, and not the church, and I have not yet found any place where the church is called Israel or Israel the church.

Ezekiel was a prophet of the captivity and evidently carried away in the second deportation with Jehoiachin (Ezek. i, 1, 2). Daniel had been taken in the first company in the reign of Jehoiakim. Jeremiah was left in Jerusalem (Jer. xxxix, 11-14). These men had a "Thus saith the Lord" for all they said, and through them He was comforting and encouraging His people. Our lesson verses, 11 to 16, are certainly plain and clear statements concerning the gathering of Israel from all the countries where they have been scattered back to their own land. Verses 23 to 27 tell of the one true Shepherd who shall then rule over them, the true David or Beloved, the Son of Mary, of whom Gabriel said that He would sit on the throne of His father David and reign over the house of Jacob forever (Luke i, 31-33). Lesson verses 17-22 give light on the sheep and goat judgment of Matt. xxv.

Sometimes, but not often a man is very ungrateful for attempts to save his life. A farmer near St. Thomas was driving along the road with a load of hay when it upset. He went away to get a couple of men to help him rebuild his load. In his absence others came along, and not seeing the driver concluded he was under the load and scattered the hay in all directions to find him. He returned, and when he viewed the scene and what had been done to his hay, the things he said were easy to hear although difficult to listen to.

Advertising!

in its highest sense is the creation of a new want and providing the means with which to apply that want. The aim of Advertising is not to spread the name of a firm so much as to get business for that firm. The ad. that counts is the one that makes the luxuries of today the necessities of tomorrow. A great many people advertise as they give to charity—merely to get rid of a solicitor. Then the advertiser says it doesn't pay and when done in that spirit it does not. Advertisers must put brain and selling force into their their copy, and when this is done they find that advertising is not an expense, but the finest kind of an investment. —S. C. Dobbs, past president Associated Advertising Clubs of America.

NOTICE TO ALL CONSUMERS OF COAL

Notices for posting up, signed by Premier Hearst and reading as follows, are being sent out:

The government of Ontario, at the request of the Dominion fuel controller, hereby draws public attention to the fuel situation in the Province. War conditions have affected the normal supply of coal, and rendered imperative that every consumer practise the utmost thrift.

Energetic measures are being adopted to prevent fuel shortage. This can only be attained by the fullest co-operation and assistance of every coal consumer.

Co-operation may be effected by the adoption of the following precautions, viz.:—

1. Refrain from using fuel of any kind, including gas, until it becomes absolutely necessary.
2. Practise rigid economy in the use of fuel.
3. Wherever possible use substitutes for coal to the fullest possible extent.
4. Guard constantly against waste of fuel when making or cleaning fires, and when using gas.
5. Thoroughly sift all coal ash, and burn the residue. The result will be surprising. One-tenth of the fuel originally fed to the fire has been recovered and utilized in this way.

The faithful observation of the foregoing by all consumers will have a marked effect in conserving the coal supply and may avert a serious crisis.

Municipal, religious, educational and other authorities and bodies are requested to repeatedly urge and impress the foregoing considerations upon the public.

Young Housebreakers Up

The two boys who broke into Alex. Stroeder's house on the South Line two weeks ago during the family's absence, appeared before Judge Greig on Monday morning. Both pleaded guilty. One lad was allowed to go on suspended sentence, his mother furnishing a bond of $100, for his good behavior the coming year. The other boy, who is a second offender out on suspended sentence, was sentenced to two years at the Reformatory at Mimico. After breaking into the house, the boys, knowing that they had been seen, lit out. They got as far as Moorefield before their money played out and they started back home. The younger boy immediately gave himself up but the older offender hid around home and the Chief had to go after him.

OUR WESTERN LETTER

Written for the Teescope By an Old Bruce Boy.

Since my last letter we have had several fine showers and everything looks a 1 at Lloyds.' Wheat now is coloring up nicely as is also barley, an odd field of barley has been cut, but barley harvest won't start in this neighborhood till next week. Harvest will be general in two weeks from now. There is still a lot of hay to put up and the crop in general is good. This has been an ideal year for hay and practically all will be secured without being wet by rain.

I saw a man last week from Southern Alberta. He tells me that there on summer fallow the wheat is good, but where the crop was carelessly put in and insufficiently worked there is no crop on a very poor one. Another man told me that in dry farming districts the farming this year has been so dry that the crop is nix.

We have had four or five years with rather a superabundance of moisture and any old thing put in any old way would fetch a crop. This has made many people careless. In this district when we had a sufficiency of moisture, the difference is apparent in the crops of the careful farmer and the man who shoved his crops in. I have heard of very little hail in this part of the country this year. I think I will quit hail insurance. I have insured for ten years straight and have never been touched. Lately we were talking to Senator Talbot, some one remarked that last year with hail and frost was the nearest he had seen to a crop failure in this district. The Senator replied that he had lived in this district for twenty four years, but he had never seen a complete crop failure here. He also thought last year was the nearest we had been to it.

The Town will have to pay $600 Can. Saddlery debs. this year. As the company has not yet turned over its assets to the town, the Clerk was asked to see that it be done. Mayor Johnston stated that as scrap metal brought a high price, now was the time for the town to get something out of the plant.

The Streets Committee will have $2500 in all this year.

RULES FOR EATING HOUSES

Three important rules for eating houses have been gazetted at Ottawa and are now in effect. A public eating place, according to the order, is a place where 25 meals a day or more are served.

(1) Beef shall not be served at more than one meal on any day, and on Tuesdays and Fridays.

(2) Bacon shall not be served at more than one meal a day and on Tuesdays and Fridays none shall be served.

(3) At every meal at which white bread is served some substitute such as corn bread, oat cakes, potatoes etc.

(4) There shall be prominently displaced a printed notice to the effect that all persons in ordering their food ought to consider the needs of Great Britain and her Allies and their armies for wheat, beef and bacon, and that the Food Controller requires the public to do everything in their power to make these commodities available for export by eating as little as possible of them, and by making use of substitutes and avoiding waste.

FOUND DEAD IN HOUSE

ary Russworm of Carrick was Dead Four Days Before Brother Called and Discovered Lifeless Body in Bed

When J. G. Russwurm, the Hanover jeweler, and a friend were motoring passed his brother's place on the 14th of Carrick Sunday morning, they dropped in to make a call and were surrised to find the doors locked. A dog rowled from within and Mr. Russurm looking in through the window, as horrified to see his brother's life- form stretched on a bed, the sun- ght streaming down on it. When ey raised the window to enter, the dor that issued forth, showed that utrefaction had set in. The deceased a bachelor and had made his home me for many years and the dog, ich was his sole companion, stood rd over his master's dead body and ld allow no one to approach it. er Dr. Portar was immediately d and after viewing the remains d that an inquest was unneces.

deceased who was in his forty- year, had farmed on the South rmnt, until two years ago, when sed of his property. Latterly ccupied a house on Mr. Philip rm and had worked at farming work throughout the neigh- . He was genial, honest, well- nd a good workman. The last him was Wednesday night when ighbor's boy saw him in the field his house. It is probable that the me evening, he felt a weak spell oming on and taking off his shoes retched himself on the bed. For veral years he had been subject to rvous spells.

The deceased came from a highly re- ected family, his parents residing near Carlsruhe. The remains were laid in the Lutheran Cemetery in Carrick on Monday.

GIVEN PUBLIC RECEPTION

Corporal Harry Heffernan Receives a Warm Welcome From His Former Townsmen at Walkerton Town Hall.

Corp. Harry Heffernan, an ex-Walkerton boy, who was invalided home from the Front recently, was given a public reception at the Town Hall on Friday evening and presented by Rev. R. Perdue on behalf of citizens of the town, with a ten dollar gold piece. A large crowd was present. Speeches were made by Mr. John Rowland, Reeve Russell, Mayor Johnston, and others. In thanking his old towns people for their kindness, Corp. Hufferman said he had heard a speaker at the Preparedness League garden party talk about conscripting men. What was wanted was conscription of money too. Corp. Heffernan has almost lost the use of one arm but hopes to have it restored by the process of grafting a piece of shin-bone into his arm.

Sergt. Harry McDougall of the 160th Batt'n., who is home on ten weeks' leave owing to ill-health, was given a hearty welcome. Harry said that the 160th was held in England by the Imperial Authorities up to the present time to train raw units.

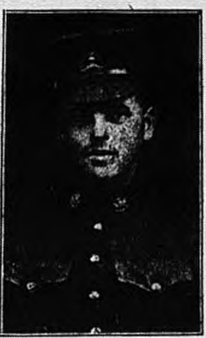
Lt.-Col. Sutherland In Command.

Lt. Col Sutherland is still in command of the 160th. Bruce Battalion. Letters received from Wittley Camp state that the Col. is back from London. It was reported that he was going to the firing line but the military authorities have apparently withheld permision to let him go.

May Be Chepstow Boy

The list of 1200 returned soldiers who landed at Quebec the other day contained the name E. V. Hogan, who is thought here to be Edward Hogan, son of Mr. John Hogan, of Chepstow, who enlisted at Regina at the beginning of the war. Another brother, James, who signed up with a Saskatoon battalion, has been at the Front since last year.

Made Supreme Sacrifice



ERNEST HALL CUNNINGHAM

Former Glamis Boy, Killed in Action in France, August 15th, 1917.

A message which came over the wire from Ottawa last Thursday conveyed to Postmaster Joseph Cunningham and wife of Glamis the sad intelligence that their youngest son, Pte. Ernest Hall Cunningham had been killed in Action Somewhere in France on August 15th, 1917. The young man who was in his 23rd year had been at the Front since May the second. Ernie, who was a general favorite around the old neighborhood, left for the West in 1911 and in the Spring of 1912 he took up a homestead near Sanford Dene, Sask., where he was living when he enlisted. He signed up on February 29, 1916, at Sanford Dene with the 209th Batt'n of Swift Current, trained at Camp Hughes, Manitoba, and left for Overseas the following October. In England he was transferred to the 9th Reserve Batt'n and left for France on May 2nd last, with the 10th Can. Batt. A letter written on Aug. 8th a week before his death, in a bright and cheerful strain, was received by his father a few days before the telegram. This was the last message received in the home from the gallant young soldier who laid down his life in the interest of humanity and justice. Besides his father and mother, there are two brothers and four sisters: A. B. A. of Melville, Sask. J. Chas. of Regina, Sask; Miss Mina, Minnedosa, Man; Mrs. R. W. Burgess, Cabri, Sask; and Miss Laura and Lila at home.

TOURNEY BIG SUCCESS

Sixty-One Rinks of Players Took Part in Big Bowling Meet Here This Week — Owen Sound Wins Trophy.

Bowlers from all points of the compass invaded the town on Monday morning and for the following two days, the Armoury's lawn was the chief centre of interest. No less than 61 rinks of bowlers, 244 men in all took part. Ninety-six players could be accomodated at one time on the local club's spacious green and it was kept going at full capacity night and day. The weather, though cool, was delightful and the tournament proved in every way a great success, reflecting much credit on President Ted McConnell, Secretary Chas Stephan and all who had a part in perfecting the arrangements for the big affair. The bowlers' wants in the refreshment line were well looked after throughout the tournament in the big marquee by the ladies of the Hospital Aid.

Batchellor of Owen Sound, who has quite acquired the trophy habit, walked off with the Tournament trophy. His strong rink won out by magnificent drawing but they had to do it to beat Allen of Mt. Forest who gave a fine exhibition of bowling at its best. The Association trophy was won by Scales of Mount Forest, Sieveright of Walkerton annexing the Consolation trophy. The Walkerton rink which got inside the money was composed of—A. P. Sieveright, skip; Alex. McNab, deputy; Harry Stephan, second; Tom Jenkins, lead.

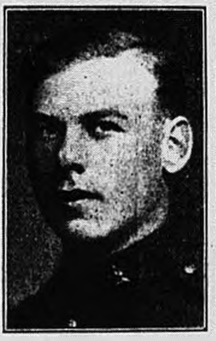
Killed In Action



SERGT. WILLIAM WOLFE

Killed in Battle Somewhere In France on August 19th, 1917.

A wire from Ottawa was received by Mrs. John Wolfe Thursday morning bearing the sad news that her son, Sergeant William Wolfe had been killed in action on Aug. 19th. Billy was a fine strapping specimen of young manhood, well-thought of in his home town. He enlisted with the 71st Battalion and when it was broken up in England, he was drafted into a Western Battalion. Before the battalion left for France he was rejected, being made an instructor at a reserve camp. He was there until two months ago when he succeeded in passing another examination and got to France. He had just been at the Front about a month when he was called upon to make the Supreme Sacrifice for flag and country. Following the telegram came a bright cheery letter from Billy written to his mother on August 1st. His young wife, who was formerly Miss Mattie Swanston, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Swanston, is at present visiting in the West. A card received from the Governor General of Canada expressed his sorrow for the family in their bereavement.

Deputy-Sheriff Ill

Deputy-Sheriff Frank Harris has been very poorly the past week and his condition is considered very serious.

Parcels for the Front

The young ladies of the Soldiers Aid are shipping sixty parcels this week to the Walkerton boys in the trenches.

For Sale at a Bargain

A slightly used Riding Plow, cost $40. Sale price $10.00. Also a driving outfit, A good driving horse 5 years old. Grey Buggy, used two months, up-to-date Cutter used 2 winters. —Apply to J. E. McGregor.

Burgled A Brewery.

The brewery at Carlsruhe was broken into on Sunday night and a load of booze big enough to fill a large motor car removed. The raiders who were evidently preparing for Labor Day festivities, got away without disturbing the slumbers of any of the neighbors and they haven't yet been located. Their haul included 6 kegs of lager, 4 cases of bottles, and a half-barrel of lager.

Hutchinson—Sillick.

A quiet wedding took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Sillick of Culross, on Wednesday, September 5th when their eldest daughter, Miss Annie was united in marriage to Mr. David Hutchinson of the same township. The ceremony was performed at High noon by Rev. F. Clydesdale, pastor of Salem Church, in the presence of the immediate relatives. Afterwards a bountiful luncheon was served. The happy and popular young couple will reside on Mr. Hutchinson's farm in Culross.

Fitzer—Himmelspach

A pretty wedding was solemnized at the R. C. Church, Detroit, on Monday morning, Aug. 20th when Miss Annie Himmelspach, a former Walkerton young lady and sister of Sergeant George Himmelspach, was united in marriage to Mr. Edward Fitzer of Detroit. The bride who was beautifully gowned in white satin trimmed with pearls and wearing the regulation wreath and veil, carried a boquet of orange blossoms. She was assisted by Miss Bertha Attwood of Detroit while Mr. John Fitzer attended the groom. After the ceremony a dainty luncheon was served at the home of the bride,s cousin, Mrs. Grubb. Mr. and Mrs. Fitzer will live in Detroit where the former has a splendid position. Many old friends of the bride in Walkerton unite in extending best wishes to the happy young couple.

BOYS PAY THE PRICE

Many Bruce and Walkerton Casualties on the Fields of France Recorded During the Past Week.

The heavy toll that the Canadians have been paying at the Front during August is reflected in the local casualities. Many homes have been saddened the last two weeks by telegrams announcing the deaths of sons at the Front and the number of local names in the casualty lists has been unusually large.

E. Grenzenbach Wounded

Rev. J. H. Grenzenbach had a telegram from Ottawa on Sunday stating that his son Earl, had been wounded on August 21st. Earl signed up with the 51st Batt'n and has been nearly a year in France. This is his first casuality.

Wounded Second Time

Mr. John Craig, who lives near the G. T. R. station, had a telegram first of the week stating that his son, Pte. Will Craig had been wounded in the chest by gunshot. This is the second time he has been in the casualty list. Will went Overseas with a Toronto Battalion.

Hurt When Mine Exploded

Letters received from England this week tell of the serious wounding of Pte. Robert Merchant, a Walkerton soldier, by the premative explosion of a mine in England. Ten Canadians were killed and thirty wounded in the accident, but Merchant was the only one from Bruce. He is now doing well in Bramshott Hospital. Full particulars have not yet been received by Mrs. Merchant

Wounded In Right Arm.

Pte. Sam Leake, a Walkerton soldier, was wounded in the right arm with gunshot on Aug. 11th. Pte. Leake went Overseas with the 160th. Batt'n. After some months in England he went to France with a draft to join a construction battalion. His wife had a letter telling her about his casualty three days before the official telegram arrived.

Chief's Son Hit.

Robert A. Ferguson, eldest son of Chief Ferguson and the first of the three brothers in khaki to reach the Front has been admitted to No. 13 Base Hospital, France, with gunshot wounds in the face. Bob. enlisted at Salmon Arm B. C. with the 172nd. Rocky Mountain Rangers and was transferred in England to the Seaforth Highlanders. He had been four months in France and had seen some heavy fighting

Killed in Action

Pte. Campbell Clark of Elmwood was reported killed in action in Tuesday's casualty list.

A Harvest Thanksgiving Social will be held at Mr. J. Holm's, con. 6 Brant on Friday evening, Sept. 7th. Paisley orchestra and other good talent. Free lunch. Admission 25 and 10 cents.

Joins Flying Corps

Mr. John Bickle, who has been learning the drygoods business with his uncles, Messrs Stephan Bros , signed up last week with the Royal Flying Corps as an air mechanic, and has gone to the Toronto Aviation School where he will take a double course in air mechanics and wireless telegraphy. After finishing his course, about Christmas, he expects to go South for further training with the Flying Corps at Dallas, Texas. John's many friends here wish him success and a safe return.

JIMMY WILSON'S FUNERAL

Editor Telescope,
Walkerton, Ont.

Dear Sir:—

Your correspondent "Citizen" in his letter last week's issue, whether intentional or not, gives your readers to understand that the remains of the late Jimmy Wilson were given the burial of a dog. The truth is that Jimmy Wilson's funeral service, with a few exceptions, was exactly the same as that held over a prince.

The service which I conducted in the chapel at the House of Refuge was the burial service of the Church of England of which Jimmy was a life-long member.

I knew him for eight years and my one bitter regret was that of those who knew him the greater part of his life life, including "Citizen" not one thought it worth while to honour Jimmy by being present at his funeral. Furthmore if I did not have to struggle in these times to make ends meet, I would have bought a lot in the cemetery myself for the remains of Jimmy Wilson.

Yours truly,

R. Perdue.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

IN the war on high prices, Mr. Hanna appears to be using blank cartridge.

AT Ottawa we have a Government of the interests, by the interests, for the interests

IF prices keep on soaring we will soon have not only meatless days, but eatless days.

THE British authorities refuse to buy the high-priced Canadian bacon. Can you blame them?

RUSSIAN soldiers receive six cents a day. It doesn't seem reasonable to expect to have first class heroes for that.

ROGERS says he resigned because he was dissatisfied with the indecision and inaction of the government. Rogers had reason to be tired of the Government, but the country is sick of one and tired of the other.

MARYLAND cobwebs are reported to have spelled "War ends in September." Lay this up on the shelf with the egg that had "w" on it for war, and the oats that have "B" on them for Berlin by Christmas.

FOOD control is no new thing in this country. For years past food has been controlled by a few provision companies and packing houses. The thing required is not so much food control, as the control of those who control food

"HOOVER OF BELGIUM" the U. S. Food Controller, has already put the machinery in motion to stop the profiteers. In Canada, the food Controller, will confine his attention to urging the over-burdened consumer to eat less.

ONTARIO this year will have the biggest oat crop in the history of the province according to Dr. A. C. Creelman, Commissioner of Agriculture for the province. "We will have 125 million bushels as compared to the average crop of 100 millions."

A MAN over in the States who talked violently against his country was taken out by a crowd and hanged. An American paper, after discussing the man, his activities, and his end, says; "It was very wrong to lynch him, but perhaps it will do him good."

YES, Canada will own a railway - the C. N. R. - but the price will be too great. Public ownership is a grand thing when it hands a melon to a bunch of financial pirates, whose wealth should be conscripted for the benefit of the nation whom they have jobbed for years past.—Kincardine Reporter.

H. F. GADSBY, the brilliant Ottawa political writer says that even the Chateau Laurier is on to Sir Joseph Flavelle. It used to be, says Gadsby, that when they saw Sir Joseph coming they struck up "He's the Lily of the Valley, the Bright and morning Star," whereas now, Sir Joseph's appearance is the signal for the orchestra to start playing "Old Black Joe."

THE Opposition has done good work in parliament in exposing the facts regarding the relations of Hon. Thos. White and the C. N. R. group. The result will probably be that the bill will be talked out in the Senate and the Country may yet be saved the many millions which Sir Thos. White proposes to hand over to his friends "Bill" and "Dan" for their worthless stock.

"CITIZEN'S" letter in last week's Telescope contained a good suggestion that the County Council provide a rig to convey the clergyman to the cemetery when inmates of the House of Refuge are to be buried. The custom up to the present time has been to have a service at the building but no formalities at the grave, in the case of protestant inmates, the body simply being covered up without any formalities. This perfunctory method of treating the unfortunate dead is not in keeping with the spirit of the times and should be remedied. The clergymen, who gladly give their services, have never been invited to go to the cemetery and could not very well go if they were, as no provision is made for conveying them to the cemetery. It is the place of the County Council to act in the matter.

A CHAPLAIN'S OPINION.

Tells of the Courage of Men at the Front.

Rev. John Garbutt, a former pastor of the Cobourg Methodist church, who went overseas with an Ontario county battalion, writes from France as follows concerning the courage and good work of the Canadians at the front:

"The Canadians are playing a most important part in the great offensive which is taking place on the Western front. We have seen very serious fighting since the 9th of April, and have made considerable progress.

"I have had a great amount of satisfaction in my work during the last two months. Our brigade had to move at 7 a.m. on Sunday to make our journey in easy stages to the place appointed us in a great offensive. I asked the Colonel for the privilege of holding services on the Saturday. It was a cold, bleak, showery day, but we had a fine parade service, and afterwards I held a communion service. A great many stayed for sacrament. It was only two days later that a number of those who stayed for sacrament gave their all for the cause.

"I find no difficulty in getting the soldiers to attend voluntary services. A week ago I had charge of a prayer meeting with three hundred men present. On the Sunday following I gave sacrament at a voluntary service in the Y. M. C. A. tent to a large number of men. I am holding on an average five services on Sunday and one service on a week evening. I know that real definite work is being done. I have had every opportunity of seeing the wounded as the stretcher-bearers brought them into the regimental aid post in the field, and in very many cases have had definite assurance of their faith and confidence in God.

"The courage of our men is sublime. No one who has not seen a modern battle can realize what it is like. To describe it as awful is to use the correct word. A barrage of fire from guns of all kinds is beyond description. One cannot conceive of anyone passing through it alive. But into this curtain of fire these brave boys go with undaunted courage and pluck. While many fall some pass through unhurt, but no one seemingly falters."

The Pine Squirrel.

One calm Indian-summer morning, when the nuts were ripe, I was camped in the pinewoods, where the squirrels seemed to be about as plentiful as the ripe burrs, writes John Muir, describing a mild adventure with a Douglas or pine squirrel. In a few moments down came the Douglas. The breakfast burrs he had cut off had rolled on the gently sloping ground into a clump of ceanothus bushes, but he seemed to know exactly where they were, for he found them at once, apparently without searching for them. They were more than twice as heavy as himself, but he managed to drag them up to the foot of the tree from which he had cut them.

Breakfast done, I whistled a tune for him before he went to work, curious to see how he would be affected by it. He had not seen me all this while; but the instant I began to whistle he darted up the tree nearest to him, and came out on a small dead limb opposite me, and composed himself to listen. Other squirrels, hearing the strange sounds, came around on all sides, also chipmunks and birds.

By this time my performance must have lasted nearly half an hour. I sung or whistled "Bonnie Doon," "Lass o' Gowrie," "O'er the Water to Charlie," "Bonnie Woods o' Craigie Lee," etc., all of which seemed to be listened to with bright interest, my first Douglas sitting patiently through it all, with his telling eyes fixed upon me until I ventured to give "Old Hundred," when he screamed his Indian name, Pillilooeet, turned tail, and darted with ludicrous haste up the tree out of sight, his voice and actions in the case leaving a somewhat profane impression.

After Half a Century.

After lying at the bottom of Lake Huron at a depth of 180 feet for over half a century, the sunken steamer Pewabic has been finally located by divers and work is now in progress to raise her $200,000 cargo of 300 tons of pure copper. This has been made possible by the invention of a special diving suit which withstands the terrific water pressure at so great a depth.

The divers state that the vessel is in fair condition with even her rigging and deck structure intact. They penetrated the vessel's cabin, on their first trip, and in it discovered a number of grinning skeletons, bleached white by their long submergence. They located a number of trinkets, which they sent to the surface. These included a silk dress, which, despite half a century below water, appeared almost as good as new when dried, while the crimson and gold coloring of some cotton goods retrieved was as bright as the day the material was purchased. There is specie yet to be found valued at $40,000.

The salvaging of this cargo will open the road to the accumulation of a fortune by members of the salvage company. Along the jaws of the Sawtooth Reef in Lake Superior alone lie scores of sunken cargo craft, laden to the scuppers with copper. The wrecks of the past half century in Lake Huron too, can be made to yield millions in gold.

Professing Too Much.

"Oh, professor! Now you're bragging."—Life.

Making Money.

In 1911 the total number of persons in Canada engaged in gainful occupations was 2,[illegible].

One of Canada's Notable Women

MRS. JULIA HENSHAW, of Vancouver, was made a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society during one of her lecturing tours in England, being the first Canadian woman to be so honored.

This unique distinction is one well merited by Mrs. Henshaw for she has, both on her private account and as a member of the Alpine Club of Canada, explored great stretches of the Rocky Mountain district, to the signal enrichment of geographic science. Her book, "Mountain Wild Flowers of Canada" and her other book with the similar title, "The Wild Flowers of British Columbia," are treasure-trove to the botanists or to the simpler lovers of flowers, to whom a pretty primrose is—a primrose.

In her lectures across the water before the war on the flora and fauna of the Canadian Rocky Mountains, the slides shown by way of illustration were remarkable for their originality and beauty and represented a collection of photographs taken by Mrs. Henshaw which is quite unique in its great extent and completeness. This lecturer has added hundreds of names to the list of known flowers in nature's garden, and may be termed a constitutional "finder" in this regard.

This scientist is not Canadian-born, although this country has taken her to and Canadianized her into an almost native. She comes of an old Shropshire family, her father being that Mr. William Henderson, who wrote a number of works on folklore and angling. She was born in Durham, not so many years ago, and preserved the name of her birthplace in her pen-name, which is seen ubiquitously, "Julian Durham."

Mrs. Henshaw has written on many subjects besides those of which we have made mention. She has contributed profusely to The Girls' Own Paper, The Canadian Magazine, The Graphic, Sketch, The Queen, Lady's Pictorial, and The Traveller. As an author, she has produced the volumes, "Hypnotized? or the Experiment of Sir Herbert Galbraith"; "Why Not, Sweetheart?" and the two books on flowers already referred to.

This clever Anglo-Canadian lady was married in 1887 to Mr. Charles Grant Henshaw, of Montreal. She had a place on the editorial staff of The Vancouver Province during the years 1894-98. Latterly her time has been principally devoted to giving lectures, illustrated with her views.

Mrs. Henshaw gave her lecture, "The Awakening of Vancouver Island," in London before the Royal Colonial Institute. A large and appreciative audience was present, Mr. J. G. Colmer, C.M.G., presiding; and previous to the lecture, the speaker of the evening was the guest of the Council of the Royal Colonial Institute at a dinner in the Whitehall Rooms. Mrs. Henshaw has done great work exploiting the wonders of Vancouver Island as she has seen them.

"She has explored," says a British Columbia writer, "many new districts in this Province, of whose vastness those of us who reside in cities have often a more imperfect conception than have those who form the Royal Geographical Society." Very easily! Mrs. Henshaw, for one, is correcting misconceptions.

This brilliant woman of research and revelation is member of a number of the organizations in which Canadian women fraternize. She belongs to the Canadian Society of Authors (as well as to the Society of Authors, England) and holds office in the Vancouver Women's Canadian Club. She is also a member—a most active one—of the Canadian Alpine Club, in which last organization she continues to be a member, though the fact is an obvious one that she has "climb."

Since 1914 she has devoted her time to war work, and in recognition of her efforts the Militia Department has made her Capt. Julia Henshaw.

No Canadian Tea Party.

Sir J. D. Rees made the suggestion in the British House of Commons recently that as Australia had prohibited the importation of teas from China and Java, in order to help the Indian and Ceylon growers, who are at present to a large extent deprived of the home market, the Colonial Secretary might suggest to the Government of Canada the propriety of taking similar action in view of the fact that the Dominion is now importing quantities of Java leaf.

Mr. Steel Maitland, Under Secretary for the Colonies, replied: "I do not think that representations could usefully be made to the Canadian Government, and if the facts are as stated in the question the Canadian Government will doubtless duly consider the matter."

He added that during the year ended 31st March last, which was the latest period for which statistics are available, the imports of Java tea into Canada did not exceed one per cent. of the total imports of tea.

Ships for Motherland.

The Imperial Munitions Board has let twenty-seven contracts for ships in British Columbia. These ships are of standard design, 250 feet long, 44 feet 6 inches beam, and 26 feet draft, having a dead weight capacity of 2,800 tons. The contracts call for delivery within fifteen months.

Our Protestants.

Of the Protestants in Canada the Presbyterians are the strongest in number, 1,115,324 being the census figures in 1911.

PROLOGUE

THE gold fever of '49 is now a chapter—and a very thrilling one, too—in our national history. Mr. White has made that feverish time live forever in this story. It is a very wonderful piece of work. He has recreated the past, and we go with bated breath through the scenes he pictures with so much vividness. "Gold" as special interest at this ime because part of the tory is laid in Panama, the oute taken by the gold seek- If your heart has ever ten a little faster at the ught of those adventurous ys, you will follow the for- tnes of this little party of our with real delight.

CHAPTER I.

Oh, Susannah!

SOMEWHERE in this story I must write a paragraph exclusively about myself. The fact that in the outcome of all these stirring events I have ended as a mere bookkeeper is perhaps a good reason why one paragraph will be enough. In my youth I had dreams a-plenty, but the event and the peculiar twist of my own temperament prevented their fulfillment. Perhaps in a more squeamish age—and yet that is not fair either to the men whose destinies I am trying to record. Suffice it, then, that of these men I have been the friend and companion, of these occasions I have been a part, and that the very lacks and reservations of my own character that have kept me to a subordinate position and a little garden have probably made me the better spectator. Which is a longer paragraph about myself than I had purposed writing.

Therefore I will pass over briefly the various reasons, romantic and practical, why I decided to join the gold rush to California in the year 1849. It was n the air, and I was then of a romanc and adventurous disposition.

The first news of the gold discovery ltered to us in a roundabout way rough vessels to the Sandwich islands, and then appeared again in the olumns of some Baltimore paper. Everybody laughed at the rumor, but everybody remembered it. The land was infinitely remote, and then, as now, romance increases as the square of the distance. There might well be gold there, but more authentic were the reports of fleas, rawhides and a dried up coast. Minstrel shows made a good deal of fun of it all, I remember. Then, when we were of a broad grin, came the publication of the letter written by Governor Mason to the war department. That was a sober official document and had to be believed, but it read like a fairy tale.

"I have no hesitation in saying," wrote the governor, "that there is more gold in the country drained by the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers than would pay the costs of the late war with Mexico a hundred times over." And he then went on to report in detail big nuggets and big washings, mentioning men, places, dates, in a circumstantial manner that carried conviction.

Our broad grins faded. The minstrels' jokes changed color. As I look back it seems to me that I can almost see with the physical eye the broad restless upheaval beneath the surface of all society. The Mexican war was just over, and the veterans—young veterans all—filled with the spirit of adventure turned eagerly toward this glittering new empire. Out in the small villages, on the small farms, the news was talked over seriously, almost without excitement, as offering a possible means of lifting the burden war had laid. Families strained their resources, mortgaged their possessions, to equip and send their single strongest members to make the common fortune.

Then came the song that caught the popular ear, and the rush was on. Most great movements are done to song, generally commonplace. It was so in this instance. "Oh, Susannah!" or rather a modification of the original made to fit the occasion, first sung in some minstrel show, ran like fire in the tinder of men's excited hopes. From every stage, on every street corner, in every restaurant and hotel it was sung, played and whistled. At the sound of its first notes the audience always sprang to its feet and cheered like mad.

The desire to go to Eldorado was universal and almost irresistible. The ability to go was much more circumscribed. For one thing, it cost a good deal of money, and that was where I bogged down at the first pull. Then, I suppose a majority did have ties of family, business or other responsibilities impossible to shake off. But we all joined one or more of the various clubs formed for the purpose of getting at least some of their members to California, and discussed heatedly the merits of the different routes, and went into minute and fascinating details as to processes of which we knew less than nothing, and sang "Oh, Susannah!" and talked ourselves into a glorified fever of excitement, and went home with our heads in the clouds. Once in a great while some of these clubs came to something—as a body, I mean—for individual members were constantly working themselves up the summit of resolution to rush headlong and regardless down the other side and out of our sight. When a man had reached a certain pitch of excitement he ran amuck. He sold anything, deserted anything, broke through anything in the way of family, responsibility or financial lacks in order to go. But, as I say, occasionally one of these clubs pooled its individual resources and bought some old tub of a whaler or outfitted a wagon train and started off. But generally we got only as far as "Oh, Susannah!" I remember once in coming out from one of our meetings finding myself next a solemn and earnest youth originally from my own village. He walked by my side for several squares lost in a brown study. Then suddenly he looked up.

"Frank," said he, with conviction, "I believe I'll go. I know most of this talk is wildly exaggerated, but I'm sensible enough to discount all that sort of thing and to disbelieve absurd stories. I shan't go with the slightest notion of finding the thing true, but will be satisfied if I do reasonably well. In fact, if I don't pick up more than a hatful of gold a day I shall be perfectly satisfied."

Which remark sufficiently indicates about where we all were.

We had many sorts of men in our club, but nearly all young. One in especial early attracted my attention and held it through all the changing vicissitudes of our many meetings. I say attracted me, though fascinated would be perhaps the better word, for after the first evening of his attendance I used deliberately so to place myself that I could watch him.

He came always in a rather worn military cape, which on entering the door he promptly threw back in such a manner as to display the red lining. This seemed an appropriate envelopment of his flashing, buoyant personality. He walked with his chin up and his back straight and trod directly on and over the ends of his toes so that he seemed fairly to spring with vigor. His body was very erect and tall and pliant, bending easily to every change of balance. If I were never to have seen his face at all I should have placed him as one of the laughing spirits of the world. His head was rather small, round, well poised, with soft close set ringlets all over it like a cap, in the fashion of some marble gods I have seen. He had very regular, handsome features, with a clear, biscuit brown complexion, and a close clipped, stubby, light mustache. All these things were interesting and attractive, though no more so than are the vigor and beauty of any perfect animal. But the quality of his eyes placed him, at least to me, in a class apart. They were sober, clear eyes that looked out gray and contemplative on the world about them, so that one got the instant impression of a soul behind them that weighed and judged. Indeed, they were not laughing eyes at all and rather negatived the impression made by the man's general bearing. But somewhere down in them something flickered like a strong burning candle in a brisk wind. Occasionally it was almost out, then again it blazed up clear, so that one thought to see it plainly through the steady brooding look. It always fascinated the beholder, for it was mysterious. Whether it came and went, grew and shrank, following delicately the moods or reflections of the spirit within, or whether it was a purely fortuitous effect of light and refraction no man was ever able to say. And some men later made some very bad guesses. I myself think it was the devil of genius—a devil behind the steady control of a clear brain. His name, I soon discovered, was Talbot Ward.

At this period I was starting in as an assistant bookkeeper to a large exporting firm. They were enterprising people, and already they were laying plans to capture some of the California trade. The office talk I heard concerning the purchase of ships, the consignment of arms, the engagement of captains and of crews further inflamed my imagination. I received the vast sum of $8 per week. As I was quite alone in the world and possessed no other resources, the saving of the $500 agreed upon as the least sum with which it was possible to get to California was fairly out of all question.

One evening after the meeting, to my great surprise, Ward fell into step with me. We had up to that moment never exchanged a word.

"In New York long?" he demanded.

"About six months," I told him.

"Farm bred, of course?" he remarked. "Where?"

"Ashbury, in Vermont," I replied, without the slightest feeling that he was intrusive.

He stopped short in the street and looked me up and down reflectively, but without comment.

"I've been watching you at these fool meetings," said he, falling into step again.

In spite of myself I experienced a glow of gratification at having been the object of his interest.

"Fool meetings?" I echoed inquiringly.

"Suppose by a miracle all that lot could agree and could start for California tomorrow in a body—that's what they are organized for, I believe," he countered—"would you go with them?"

"Why not?"

"Martin is why not, and Fowler is why not, and that little Smith runt and six or eight others. They are weak sisters. If you are going into a thing go into it with the strong men. I wouldn't go with that crowd to a snake fight if it was twelve miles away. Where do you live?"

"West Ninth street."

"That's not far. Have you a good big room?"

"I have a very small hall bedroom," I replied wonderingly. "A number of us have the whole of the top floor."

Somehow, I must repeat, this unexplained intrusion of a total stranger into my private affairs did not offend.

"Then you must have a big sitting room. How many of you?"

"Four."

"Can you lick all the others?"

I stopped to laugh. By some shrewd guess he had hit on our chief difficulty as a community. We were all four country boys with a good deal of residuary energy and high spirits, and we were not popular with the tenants underneath.

"You see, I'm pretty big"—I reminded him.

"Yes, I see you are. That's why I'm with you. Do you think you can lick me?"

I stopped short again in surprise.

"What in blazes"—I began.

He laughed, and the devils in his eyes danced right out to the surface of them.

"I asked you a plain question," he said, "and I'd like the favor of a plain answer. Do you think you can lick me as well as your rural friends?"

"I can," said I shortly.

He ran his arm through mine eagerly. "Come on," he cried, "on to West Ninth!"

We found two of my roommates smoking and talking before the tiny open fire. Talbot Ward, full of the business in hand, rushed directly at the matter once the introductions were over.

Our arrangements were very simple. The chairs were few and pushed back easily, and we had an old set of gloves.

"Which is it to be?" I asked my guest, "boxing or wrestling?"

"I said you couldn't lick me," he replied. "Boxing is a game with rules. It isn't fighting at all."

"You want to bite and gouge and scratch, then?" said I, greatly amused.

"I do not. They would not be fair. A fight's a fight, but a man can be decent with it all. We'll put on the gloves, and we'll hit and wrestle both—in fact, we'll fight."

"Do you think you can lick me?"

He began rapidly to strip.

"Would you expect to get off your clothes in a real fight?" I asked him a little sardonically.

"If I expected to fight, yes!" said he. "Why not? Didn't the Greek and Roman and Hebrew and Hun and every other good old fighter 'strip for the fray' when he got a chance? Of course! Take off your shirt, man!"

I began also to strip for this strange contest whose rules seemed to be made up from a judicious selection of general principles by Talbot Ward.

My opponent's body was as beautiful as his head. The smooth white skin covered long muscles that rippled beneath it with every slightest motion. The chest was deep, the waist and hips narrow, the shoulders well rounded. In contrast my own big prominent muscles, trained by heavy farm work of my early youth, seemed to move slowly, to knot sluggishly though powerfully. Nevertheless I judged at a glance that my strength could not but prove greater than his. In a boxing match his little quickness might win, provided he had the skill to direct it. But in a genuine fight within the circumscribed and hampering dimensions of our little room I thought my own rather unusual power must crush him. The only unknown quantity was the spirit of gameness of us two. I had no great doubt of my own determination in that respect. I had been on too many log drives to fear personal encounter. And certainly Talbot Ward seemed to show nothing but eager interest.

"You don't show up for what you are in your clothes," said he. "This is going to be more fun than I had thought."

My roommates perched on the table and the mantelpiece out of the way. I asked the length of the rounds.

"Rounds!" echoed Talbot Ward, with a flash of teeth beneath his little mustache. "Did you ever hear of rounds in a real fight?"

CHAPTER II.

The Hammerlock.

WITH the words he sprang forward and hit me twice. The blows started at the very toe of his foot, and they shook me as no blows, even with the bare fist, had ever shaken me before or since. Completely dazed, I struck back, but encountered only the empty air. Four or five times from somewhere those pile driver fists descended upon me. Being now prepared to some extent, I raised my elbows and managed to defend my neck and jaws. The attack was immediately transferred to my body, but I stiffened my muscles thankfully and took the punishment. My river and farm work had so hardened me there that I believe I could have taken the kick of a mule without damage were I expecting it.

The respite enabled my brain to clear. I recovered slowly from the effect of those first two vicious blows. I saw Ward, his eyes narrowed calculatingly, his body swinging forward like a whalebone spring, delivering his attack with nice accuracy. A slow anger glowed through me. He had begun without the least warning, had caught me absolutely unaware. I hit back.

He was so intent on his own assault, so certain of the blinding effect of his first attack, that I hit him. I saw his head snap back and the blood come from his lips. The blows were weak, for I was still dazed, but they served together with the slow burn of my anger, greatly to steady me. We were once more on equal terms.

For perhaps two minutes I tried to exchange with him. He was in and out like lightning. He landed on me hard almost every time. He escaped nine out of ten of my return counters. Decidedly I was getting the worst of this, though my heavier body took punishment better than his lighter and more nervous frame. Then suddenly it occurred to me that I was playing his game for him. As long as he could keep away from me he was at an advantage. My best chance was to close.

From that moment I took the aggressive and was in consequence the more punished. My rushes to close in were skillfully eluded, and they generally laid me wide open. My head was singing, and my sight uncertain, though I was in no real distress. Ward danced away and slipped around tense as a panther.

Then by a very simple ruse I got hold of him. I feinted at rushing him, stopped and hit instead and then, following closely the blow, managed to seize his arm. For ten seconds he jerked and twisted and struggled to release himself. Then suddenly he gave that up, dove forward and caught me in a grapevine.

He was a fairly skillful wrestler and very strong. It was as though he were made of whalebone springs. But never yet have I met a man of my weight who possessed the same solid strength, and Ward would tip the scales at considerably less. I broke his hold and went after him.

He was as lively as an exceedingly slippery fish. Time after time he all but wriggled from my grasp, and time after time he broke my hold by sheer agility. His exertions must have been to him something terrible, for they required every ounce of his strength at the greatest speed. I could, of course, take it much easier, and every instant I expected to feel him weaken beneath my hands, but apparently he was as vigorous as ever. He was in excellent training. At last, however, I managed to jerk him whirling past me, to throw his feet from under him and to drop him beneath me. As he fell he twisted, and by a sheer fluke I caught his wrist.

Thus through no great skill of my own the fortunes of war had given me a hammerlock on him. Most people know what that is. Any one else can find out by placing his forearm across the small of his back and then getting somebody else to press upward on the forearm. The Greek statue of "The Wrestlers" illustrates it. As the pressure increases so does the pain. When the pain becomes intense enough the wrestler rolls over, and the contest is won. Some people can stand it longer than others, but all sooner or later must give up. In fact, skilled wrestlers, knowing that otherwise the inevitable end is a broken arm, save themselves much tribulation by immediately conceding the bout once this deadly hold is gained.

I began to force Talbot Ward's hand slowly up his back.

Very gently, an inch at a time, I pressed. He said nothing. Once he attempted to slip sidewise; but, finding me of course fully prepared for that, he instantly ceased struggling. After I had pushed the hand to the hurting point I stopped.

"Well?" said I.

He said nothing.

Now, I was young and none too well disciplined, heated by contest and very angry at having been so unexpectedly attacked at the beginning. I was quite willing to hurt him a little. Slowly and steadily and, I am ashamed to say, with considerable satisfaction I pressed the arm upward. The pain must have been intense. I could feel the man's body quiver between my knees and saw the sweat break out afresh. Still he made no sign, but dug his forehead into the floor. "I can stand this as long as you can," said I to myself grimly.

He Escaped Nine Out of Ten of My Return Counters.

But at last I reached the point where I knew that another inch, another pound, would break the bone.

"Do you give up?" I demanded.

"No!" he gasped explosively.

"I'll break your arm!" I snarled at him.

He made no reply.

The blood was running into my eyes from a small scrape on my forehead. It was nothing, but it annoyed me. I was bruised and heated and mad. Every bit of antagonism in me was aroused. As far as I was concerned, it was a very real fight.

"All right," I growled. "I'll keep you there then, —— you!"

Holding the arm in the same position, I settled myself. The pain to the poor chap must have been something fearful, for every muscle and tendon was stretched to the cracking point. His breath came and went in sharp hisses, but he gave no other sign. My heat cooled, though, as I look back on it, far too slowly. Suddenly I arose and flung him from me. He rolled over on his back and lay, his eyes half closed, breathing deeply. We must have been a sweet sight, we two young barbarians, myself marked and swollen and bloody, he with one eye puffed and pale as death. My roommates, absolutely fascinated, did not stir.

The tableau lasted only the fraction of a minute, after all. Then abruptly Talbot Ward sat up. He grinned up at me with his characteristic momentary flash of teeth.

"I told you you couldn't lick me," said he.

I stared at him in astonishment.

"Licked? Why, I had you cold!"

"You had not."

"I'd have broken your arm if I had gone any further."

"Well, why didn't you?"

I stared into his eyes blankly.

"Would you have done it?" I asked in a sudden flash of illumination.

"Why, of course," said he, with a faint contempt as he arose.

"Why did you hit me at first as you did? You gave me no warning whatever."

"Do you get any warning in a real fight?"

I could not controvert this, and yet uneasily, vaguely I felt there must be a fallacy somewhere. I had been told and not told what should or should not be done in an affair that apparently could have no rules and yet had distinctions as to fair and unfair, some of which were explained and some left as obvious. I felt somewhat confused. But often in my later experience with Talbot Ward I felt just that way, so in retrospect it does not strike me so forcibly as it did at that time.

"But you're a wonder, a perfect wonder!" Ward was saying.

Then we all became aware of a knocking and a rattling at the door. It must have been going on for some time.

"If you don't open I'll get the police! I promise you, I'll get the police!" the voice of our landlady was saying.

We looked at each other aghast.

"I suppose we must have been making a little noise," conceded Talbot Ward. Noise! It must have sounded as though the house were coming down. Our ordinary little boxing matches were nothing to it.

Ward threw his military cape around his shoulders and sank back into a seat beneath the window. I put on an overcoat. One of the boys let her in.

She was thoroughly angry, and she gave us all notice to go. She had done that same every Saturday night for a year, but we had always wheedled her out of it. This time, however, she seemed to mean business. I suppose we had made a good deal of a racket. When the fact became evident I, of course, shouldered the whole responsibility. Thereupon she turned on me. Unexpectedly Talbot Ward spoke up from the obscurity of his corner. His clear voice was incisive, but so courteous with the cold finality of the high bred aristocrat that Mrs. Simpkins was cut short in the middle of a sentence.

"I beg you, calm yourself, madam," said he. "It is not worth heating yourself over, for the annoyance, such as it is, will soon be removed. Mr. Munroe and myself are shortly departing together for California."

If I had any scruples—and I do not remember many—they were overcome within the next day or two. It was agreed that I was to go in Ward's employ, he to pay my passage money and all expenses, I to give him half the gold I might pick up. This seemed to me at least an eminently satisfactory and businesslike arrangement. Ward bought the outfits for both of us. It turned out that he was a Mexican war veteran—hence the military cape—and in consequence an old campaigner. His experience and my rural upbringing saved us from most of the ridiculous purchases men made at that time. We had stout clothes and boots, a waterproof apiece, picks and shovels, blankets and long strips of canvas, three axes, knives, one rifle, a double shotgun and a Colt's revolver apiece. The latter seemed to me a wonderful weapon, with its six charges in the turning cylinder, but I had no opportunity to try it.

Ward decided instantly for the Panama route.

"It's the most expensive, but also the quickest," said he. "A sailing ship around the Horn takes forever, and across the plains is ditto. Every day we wait some other fellow is landing in the diggings."

Nearly every evening he popped into our boarding house, where, owing to the imminence of my departure, I had been restored to favor. I never did find out where he lived. We took our passage at the steamship office. We went to the variety shows and sang "Oh, Susannah!" with the rest. We strutted a bit and were only restrained from donning our flannel shirts and Colt's revolving pistols in the streets of New York by a little remnant, a very little remnant, of common sense. When the time at last came we boarded our steamship and hung over the rail and cheered like crazy things. I personally felt as though a lid had been lifted from my spirit and that a rolling cloud of enthusiasm was at last allowed to puff out to fill my heaven.

In two days we were both over being seasick and had a chance to look around us. Our ship was a sidewheel steamer of about a thousand tons, and she carried 290 passengers, which was about 200 more than her regular complement. They were as miscellaneous a lot as mortal eye ever fell upon, from the lank Maine Yankee to the tall, sallow, black haired man from Louisiana. I suppose, too, all grades of the social order must have been represented, but in our youth and high spirits we did not go into details of that sort. Every man, with the exception of a dozen or so, wore a red shirt, a slouch hat, a revolver and a bowie knife, and most of us had started to grow beards. Unless one scrutinized closely such unimportant details as features, ways of speech or manners, one could not place his man's former status, whether as lawyer, physician or roustabout. And we were too busy for that. I never saw such a busy place as that splattering old ship slowly wallowing her way south toward the tropical seas. We had 88,000 things to discuss, beginning with Marshall's first discovery, skipping through the clouds of rumors of all sorts, down to intimate details of climate, outfit, prospects, plans and the best methods of getting at the gold. And to all these subjects we brought a dozen points of view, each of which was strange to all the others. We had with us men from every stratum of society and from every point of the compass. Each was a product of his own training and mental upbringing and was incapable, without great effort, of understanding his neighbor's point of view. Communication and travel were in these days very limited, it must be remembered, and different communities and sections of the country produced strong types. With us discussion became an adventurous exploration into a new country. The man from Maine could not but be interested in finding out what that strange, straight haired, dark creature from Carolina might think of even the most commonplace subject. Only our subjects were not commonplace.

So my chief impression of that voyage down was of knots of men talking hurriedly and excitedly, as though there were not a moment to waste, and the hum of voices rising and falling far into the night.

CHAPTER III.

The Village by the Lagoon.

NEVER before nor since have I looked upon such a variety of equipment as strewed the decks and cabins of that ship. A great majority of the passengers knew nothing whatever about out of door life and less than nothing as to the conditions in California and on the way. Consequently they had bought liberally of all sorts of idiotic patent contraptions. India rubber played a prominent part. And the deck was cumbered with at least forty sorts of machines for separating gold from the soil, some of them to use water, some muscular labor, and one tremendous affair with wings was supposed to fan away everything but the gold. Differing in everything else, they were alike

Pleased With Tractor's Work.

W. J. McNally of Brant Tp. and wife were visiting their uncle and aunt in town on Saturday evg. and Sunday. Mr. McNally was the first man to use a tractor on his farm in Bruce County and he is quite well pleased with the result. It ploughed 10 acres in 14 hours and it was hard sod through which two horses could hardly pull a plough. He is practising greater production and is sowing fall wheat in this sod field. He says that with the present scarcity and high prices for farm laborers, the tractor did the work cheaper than he could have hired men this season. When we asked him what his opinion was of Hon. Duncan Marshall's statement that discarded tractors were to be seen in abundance in the West, he said these were the larger tractors which the farmers were unable to operate after owning them a short time.—Chesley Enterprise.

HANOVER

Lieut. Col. G. F. McFarland and Sergt. Major Alf Andrews, formerly R S. M. of the 147th Battalion, Shallow Lake, have been mentioned by the secretary of the War Office for good service connected with the war, according to a letter received from England in Owen Sound.

Mr. John Priester, resident of Hanover for over twenty years, has gone the way of all flesh, death occurring at his home in town on Wednesday, Aug. 22nd, at the age of 71 years, 11 months and 7 days. Death was due to diabetes. He was born in St. Onenta on Sept. 15th, 1845, and came to Carlsruhe when a young man where he married Miss Susan Schnitzler in 12. He lived in Carlsruhe until 1866 when he moved to Hanover. Three years ago his health failed. He is survived by his widow and three children, as follows: Lena of Kitchener, Peter of Morris, Man., Joe of Grand Rapids, Mich., Mrs. Mary McGeagh of Hanover, William of Wetaskiwin, Alta., and Frank of Hanover.

Pte. Albert Jacob was given a civic reception in the Town Hall.

Word has been received of the death of Mr. J. Young, former bandmaster of the 147th Greys, who passed away in Toronto on Friday, August 10th. Mr. Young went overseas and took ill in England and returned to this country on July 17th.

On Monday evening of this week a number of ladies representing the Pinkerton Red Cross called at the home of Mrs. H. McAfee and presented her daughter, Miss Bertha, who has enlisted as a Red Cross nurse with a purse of gold. Mrs. Gale read the following address and Mrs. A. Bain made the presentation.

Dear Miss McAfee,—

We have come here this evening on behalf of the Pinkerton Red Cross Society to express our appreciation of the sacrifice you are making and to wish you well in your career as a Red Cross nurse.

Your country has called and you have answered the call nobly. Your path of life will not be smooth, there will be grave trials to be borne but through it all you may know that you are doing the utmost a woman can do for her country. How many homes have been darkened, even as yours has been, we sympathize sincerely with you in your bereavement but think from how many homes you may ward off the dark cloud by your services to the wounded.

We owe a debt that can never be repaid to Florence Nightingale. In founding the Red Cross, she began a work that cannot be too highly valued. How could we expect our soldiers to recover from the serious wounds they receive were it not for the excellent medical treatment they receive.

We cannot wish you a pleasant experience for that would not be a nurse's life but we do wish you the happiness which results from the knowledge of a duty faithfully fulfilled and we ask you to accept this purse as an expression of the well wishes of the Pinkerton Red Cross Society.

Signed on behalf of the Society:—Mrs. Gale, Mrs W. Alexander, Mrs. A. Reid, Mrs. J. Mutrie, Mrs. A. Bain.

Mr. Stanley Hutton left for the West on Thursday morning.

A very sad and sudden death occurred when Mr. Henry Russworm was found dead in his residence, 14th of Carrick, by his brothers of Hanover who were going to give him a call and and not receiving an answer from him from the door they broke open the door and finding him lying on his bed dead. It is believed he had died on Wednesday, the 29th of August and was found Sunday noon. The funeral took place at his parents residence, Carlsruhe, on Monday morning at nine o'clock at the house thence to Church, on the tenth con. of Carrick. A service was held in Church. Mr. Rev. Brachabust preaching on the text. Amos 3rd Chapter part 6 verse, "Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord have not done it." Deceased was born the 18th of March 1871, aged 46 years, 6 months, 11 days. The remains were laid to rest in the Lutheran cemetery on the tenth of Carrick. He leaves to mourn, his aged father, Valentine Russworm of Carlsruhe, six brothers, William of Elmwood, John, Jacob, and Valentine of Hanover, Chas. and Fred at home and five sisters, Minnie and Tillie at home, Mrs. Litt of Hanover and Mrs. Walter Hickling 14th of Carrick and Mrs. Ries of near Carlsruhe. Our sympathy goes out to the bereaved friends.

A Y. P. A. Social was held on the lawn of Mr. Ph. Gress on Tuesday night Sept. 4th. A large crowd of about two hundred visitors were present, the Alliances represented were, Hanover, Ayton, Alsfeldt, Clifford, Mildmay and Walkerton. A program was rendered with selections from the different Alliances. After the programme lunch was served and the evening spent in the playing of games. Everybody left after having had a good time. About 40 autos were present. The proceeds will go to Missions.

WAR PROSPERITY

Lessons From The American Civil War

DURING the year 1916 Canadians added more than two hundred millions of dollars to their bank deposits. The per capita average in savings banks was increased during this period from $55 to $92.26. Our export trade, during the year ending September 1, 1916, reached the grand total of one billion and fifty-two millions of dollars. Canada's total trade for the same period showed a gain of about 90%—mark that—within 10% of doubling the total trade of the previous twelve months.

The estimated value of the agricultural production of Canada's Western Provinces, during 1916, reached a total of more than two hundred and thirty-one millions of dollars. This great wealth was created by a rural population of only slightly more than three-quarters of a million people.

These figures indicate wonderful prosperity in Canada. They tell a story of prosperity in a nation at war that is almost unbelievable to the outside world. Residents of the United States who come into Canada express amazement at the signs of prosperity to be found on every hand. The crowds to be seen at the theatres and places of amusement and indulgence in practically every large city indicate that our people have plenty of money to spend. The manner in which the war loans have been oversubscribed may be taken as another indication of the flood of war prosperity in Canada to-day.

But what of the period after the war? Will this prosperity live? Will Canada at the close of the war be able to maintain the big balance of trade in her favor which is now being piled up at the rate of half a billion dollars per year? When the demand for munitions cease, will we be able to transfer all these factories to normal trade conditions and still hold this war time prosperity?

Accepting the possibility that the war will continue for another year or more, it is time we were evolving some plan to care for these after the war conditions. But to plan is not enough. We must act. That Canada faces a serious situation in this approaching anti-war period is predicted in the history of the Civil War in the United States, where conditions in the Northern States were quite similar in many respects to those which now prevail in Canada.

From 1862 on to the close of the war, the Northern States showed prosperity on every hand. The raiding parties from the Confederate Army breaking through into Pennsylvania carried back to the half-starved South stories that Northern industries were going ahead as if the nation was running upon a well-organized peace schedule, instead of being engaged in a momentous civil war. The Chicago Tribune near the close of the war said, "Commerce, business, manufactures and labor are going ahead as in a profound peace, save with more impetus and whirling activity than peace ever knew." The New York Economist, however, pointed out that much of the apparent prosperity was fictitious. It declared that the laboring people were suffering because of war conditions, because wages had increased only about 12%, while the cost of living had more than doubled. Professor Roland P. Falkner, a recognized statistical authority of that day, presented two important conclusions after a careful study of civil war conditions: "During the war period the advance in wages was not commensurate with the advance in prices." The late Nelson W. Aldrich, the great economist of the United States Senate, reviewed the apparent prosperity during and after the Civil War in the following: "Money wages responded with unmistakable slowness to the inflating influence of the civil war. In 1865 when prices stood at 217 as compared with 100 in 1860, wages had only touched 143."

We find also that the demand for labor was the greatest in the history of the States up to that period. The extensive recruiting from the farms and farming districts, and the extraordinary demands of the munition plants, brought a shortage of labor everywhere. During the last two years of the Civil War many of the farms in the Central Western States remained idle because it was impossible to secure help. From 1863 to 1865 immigration from Europe to the United States increased at a rapid rate, yet the demand for laborers was so great that Congress saw fit to enact laws to still further increase this immigration.

According to Rhodes' "History of the United States," it was tradition in skilled labor circles that times were hard just before the war and began to be good during the Civil War. According to this authority the wage-earning mechanics bought lots and saved money during the war period, while the clerks, teachers and others on a salary basis suffered.

At the close of the war there was a rapid spread of enthusiasm for a continuation of the so-called prosperity. New enterprises were launched on every hand; speculation was rife. The returning soldier farmers migrated in large parties to fertile valleys tributary to the Mississippi. This broadening of the agricultural situation brought a demand for more rail mileage and something more than 15,000 miles were constructed in the West from 1865 to 1873. This work brought employment to thousands. The first annual report of the Commissioner of Labor, published in 1886, reviews this construction period as follows:

"The stimulation to all industries resulting from the war, the speculative enterprises undertaken, the extension of credits, and the slackening of production necessarily caused a reaction; but the period was hardly spoken of by business men as one of any particular hardship. People for a while began to be conservative, but the impetus engendered by the war could not be overcome and it was not until the crash of 1873 that the effects of undue excitement in all branches of business and trade were thoroughly realized."

Comparing these Civil War conditions with those prevailing in Canada, we see many danger signals. The most important of these is the necessity for re-organizing production upon a sound and economic basis after our great munition plants have fulfilled their function, and for increasing our agricultural production.

We take pride in the large agricultural production in Canada, yet it is startling the great quantities of farm products we purchase every year from the United States. The imports for 1913 shows that we bought 4,000,000 dozen more eggs than we sold the Americans, and that we consumed a quarter of a million pounds of butter made across the line and sold them practically nothing. We purchased 300,000 pounds more cheese from our neighbors to the south than we sold them, and we paid $100,000 in duty upon $1,000,000 worth of tomatoes grown in the States. We even bought 600,000 bushels of potatoes more than we sold.

Canada ought to produce all this farm produce within her own borders and have a balance for sale in the world markets.

It is estimated that some 200,000 workers are now employed upon munitions, and that 75% of this number will require different employment after the war. We will have some 200,000 soldiers returning to our shores after the war of which number, it is estimated, we will be called upon to find employment for fully 150,000. In addition, there will be quite probably, a flood of immigration to add to the labor market.

A practical scheme for re-organizing our manufacturing production should embrace a plan to induce American manufacturers to build branch plants in Canada. We must make a study of the market possibilities which our manufacturers will have at home and among the entente nations after the war.

These After-the-War problems are worthy of the best efforts of our greatest statesmen and thinkers. Canada has won nationhood through her part in the great war on behalf of the Empire. She holds an opportunity to develop into a world power if she builds her future upon the proper economic foundation. But we must act quickly and intelligently if we are to make the most of these big opportunities.

Empress Zita of Austria Searched Out Officials Who Were Not Competent

SWISS newspapers reprint the following story, which has been going the rounds of the Austrian and German press:

"On one of the recent fat days in Vienna the Empress Zita, disguised as the wife of a Vienna workingman, mixed among the purchasers of fats in order to see for herself how much truth there was in the complaints in the press about the bureaucracy prevailing at the selling of fats. Soon she was engaged in conversation with the other women, and Frau X was telling about her family and her children that she had been compelled to leave behind without anyone to watch them because she frequently had to wait hours to get a little fat, and Frau Y sang the same song in a little different key.

"An hour passed, and then two and finally three, while the Empress was talking with her new acquaintances about their household joys and woes and they were vainly trying to get to the fat counter. There were far too few officials on hand, and those who were there were so indifferent and indolent that no progress was being made. Dozens who had not yet been served after having waited for hours were still standing in front of the shop when the clock struck five and down rolled the shop shutter with a crash, and despite all the pleas of the women for service the officials said: 'It is now closing time and time to quit work. To-morrow the performance will begin again. You will have to come again to-morrow.'

"Then the women were filled with natural indignation and they were not at all backward in voicing their complaints, while their new colleague carefully noted what was going on and then disappeared unobserved into a side street, whence she quickly made her way home in a court automobile. There the Emperor at once received an exact report of the state of affairs, and a few minutes later the question as to how things had gone that day in selling fat was put to the officials at the salesroom, from the highest authority. 'Remarkably well,' was the report. 'The work of distribution was already ended at six o'clock and everybody was satisfied.' 'Then why didn't the Empress get any fat, although she waited for hours?' was the next question, and the interrogator rang off. It must have rung unpleasantly in the officials' ears all night and still more so the next morning when the order came: 'Transferred to field service at the front because of incompetency in the supply service.'

"This incident, like many another since the ascendancy of the royal young pair to the throne, has found a very joyful echo among the people, and the hope is again springing up that at last someone has been found who has the courage to wring the neck of the Austrian bureaucracy and that Emperor Charles and his noble companion, Empress Zita, are the ones to do it."

Polar Caps in Mars.

Since the preliminary announcement that he had found an apparent relation between the sunspot period and the behavior of the polar caps of Mars, M. Antoniadi has published detailed observations which appear to establish this relation in a striking manner. Except in two years, 1862 and 1877, when local conditions on Mars may have disturbed the effects of solar radiation, he finds that whenever sunspots are large and numerous the melting of the Martian polar caps is rapid, and that whenever sunspots are small and few the melting of the caps takes place slowly. As Maunder has pointed out, the meteorology of Mars is much simpler than that of the earth. Hence a more direct response on the part of Martian "weather" to the variations in solar radiation of which greater or less spottedness is one of the indications.

U. S.'s Part in Great War.

As a climax to General Sir William Robertson's graphic review of the units of the human race at war comes the alarming assurances from Former President Taft that the United States will have to put millions of men and billions of money into the struggle. Speaking at Pittsburg, Mr. Taft said:

Canada alone has sent 400,000 men out of a population of not more than 6,000,000. If we are to do our part in the same proportion we must send six million men to the front.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson XI.—Third Quarter, For Sept. 9, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, Dan. i, 8-20—Memory Verses, 19, 20—Golden Text, Dan. i, 8—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

In Daniel and his three friends we see four Jews, men of God, in a difficult place, glorifying the God of Israel. In Daniel himself we see one of the greatest men of God that ever lived, with whom the Spirit associates Noah and Job and whom our Lord Jesus spoke of as Daniel the prophet (Ezek. xiv, 14, 20; Matt. xxiv, 15). Captives like these are represented by Jeremiah's basket of good figs as sent to Babylon for their good, and the good of others, and the glory of God (Jer. xxiv, 1-7), as Joseph was sold into slavery in Egypt for his good and that God might be glorified in him. Believers are not on earth now for their own comfort, but that in us the life of Jesus may be made manifest and Christ magnified in our bodies, whether by life or death (II Cor. iv, 10, 11; Phil. i, 20). The Lord gave Jehoiakim and some of His people and the holy vessels into the hand of the king of Babylon or else they would not have been there (Dan. i, 1, 2).

It was God who gave Daniel favor and tender love from the prince of the eunuchs; also He gave to these four knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom and gave Daniel understanding in visions and dreams (verses 9, 17). Thus in all the Bible story we see God holding strongly with those whose hearts are whole toward Him, a God who worketh for those who wait for and upon Him (II Chron. xvi, 9; Isa. lxiv, 4, R. V.; Ps. lxii, 5). It will be so in our daily lives if we are as true to Him as were Daniel and his friends, and we may prove and make manifest that it is God who worketh in us to will and to do of His good pleasure the things that are pleasing in His sight (Phil. ii, 13; Heb. xiii, 21).

Our lesson story is briefly that the king of Babylon gave orders to the master of his eunuchs to select from the royal Jewish captives some young men, physically well favored and of good education, that they might be taught the learning of the Chaldeans and be with him in his palace. They were to be well nourished from the king's table with such food and drink as he himself used and at the end of three years brought before the king (verses 3-5). Not many young men, even in our day, would have taken a stand against such good eats, as the boys call them, but Daniel knew that this was food which had been first offered to idols, as was the custom of the heathen, and he could not with a clear conscience partake of it (Acts xv, 29), so he asked and obtained favor of the prince of the eunuchs in this matter, for God was with him (verses 8-10). Those who find only a so called temperance lesson here are about as wise as those who think that the teaching is just this—that a vegetable diet is, on the whole, the most healthful.

I do not think that any one can write more strongly against the beastly sin of drunkenness and the evils of strong drink than I have done, but to take a lesson like this in which it is a question of worshiping God or idols and tone it down to a mere matter of ordinary self control seems to be as bad as some other treatment that the Bible is receiving at the hands of its friends (?) today. Some folks need to be reminded of the words of our Lord Jesus in Matt. xv, 10, 11, "Hear and understand not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man, but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man." Along with that keep I Cor. vi, 9, 10, but note all the sins mentioned and thank God for verse 11.

Daniel could stand against the worship of idols, but when their beautiful names, each of which had something of God or Jehovah in them, were taken from them and heathen names substituted (verses 6, 7) Daniel submitted, for that did not affect his worship of the true God, and long afterward we know that the Lord Jesus submitted to be called a glutton and a winebibber and a devil and in other ways to be numbered with transgressors. Sometimes we can glorify Him by submitting to wrongs done to us, but when it comes to worshiping God or the devil there is only one thing to do, as we shall see in our next lesson. May we all have Daniel's purpose of heart in cleaving to the Lord and the grace of continuance so manifest in him (verses 8, 21). It is one thing to have a good purpose, but quite another to carry it out and prove year after year under all circumstances a patient continuance in well doing. Continuance is the proof before men of true discipleship, and the lack of it is evidence of unreality (Rom. ii, 7; John viii, 31; I John ii, 19). Daniel saw the beginning of the times of the gentiles. We have come to the beginning of the end of the same, as we saw in a previous lesson. But God is the same, and we need the same purpose and continuance that were seen in Daniel, and as never before, for the churches are full of unbelief and worldly conformity, and the times are dark indeed. But the morning cometh. We surely need the wisdom which only God can give if we would understand the times and our right relationship to God and the world, for the wisdom and learning and scholarship of the age are utterly at fault. They know not the thoughts of the Lord; neither understand they His counsel (Mic. iv, 12).

The Campbell Flour Mills Company's great offer of the big One-Hundred-and-Fifty-Dollar Pathe phonographs (Five of them!) and other valuable prizes, for the best loaves of bread baked with Cream of the West flour, is stirring up tremendous interest all over Ontario. Many girls are already busy as bees practising with Cream of the West flour. Last year many girls declared, "Oh, if I had only practised, I'm sure I could have won!" Don't wait another day. Decide right now! Practise, Practise, Practise with

the hard wheat flour that is guaranteed for bread

Every time you bake with it you find out new qualities in this flour that makes such splendid big loaves of delicious light bread. Practise!

In five districts, each comprising several counties, we will give away free to the winner of the first district prize a large cabinet phonograph. At each fair there will be given a fine list of local prizes.

Prizes Worth Trying Hard For

1st Local Prize.—"Girls' Own Annual," a great big beautifully bound, illustrated book with 800 pages of stories and articles about people, art, animals, gardening, sewing, crocheting—everything that particularly interests young girls, older girls and their mothers. This is a wonderful prize that you can treasure for years.

2nd Local Prize.—"Stories of Famous Men and Women," heavily cloth bound with gold titles, many beautiful pictures in colors, entrancing life stories of Florence Nightingale, Grace Darling, Flora MacDonald, Jenny Lind, the late Queen Victoria, and others.

3rd Local Prize.—"Britain Overseas," a big handsomely bound book with many colored pictures, interesting stories and descriptions of the countries and the people of Britain's world wide Empire.

4th Local Prize.—"The Queen's Gift Book," a book of stories, pictures and special articles by Britain's best writers; the proceeds from the sale of this book are for the benefit of disabled soldiers in England.

Note.—Unless the entries number six or more only first and second prizes will be awarded. Unless the entries number ten or more no fourth prize will be awarded.

The District Prizes.—The winner of the first prize at each local fair automatically becomes a competitor for the following District prizes.

1st District Prize.—The "Pathephone" is the name given to the fine big mahogany phonograph we offer as first prize. It will give you endless pleasure and entertainment for a lifetime. It has special reproducer attachments and needles, enabling you to play all kinds of flat disc records of no matter what make. The Pathephone reproduces band music, orchestra music, songs and funny pieces perfectly; with it goes a dozen of the famous Pathe records. Total value, $150.00.

2nd District Prize.—Set of Dickens' Works, 18 splendidly bound volumes with many illustrations. Among the books in the set are "Oliver Twist" and "Old Curiosity Shop." These are two of the most entrancing stories ever written.

3rd, 4th, and 5th Prizes—"Cannell" Bread mixers. This simple, yet well-made machine, takes the hard work out of bread making. Instead of laborious kneading of the old method, you just put in the ingredients, turn the handle, and the dough is thoroughly and more evenly mixed.

Read Carefully Conditions of Contest

Every girl may compete at the rural school fair in her district, whether or not she attends school, providing that her 12th birthday occurs before November 1st, 1917, or her 19th birthday does not occur before Nov. 1, 1917. One loaf of bread must be submitted baked in pan about 7 x 5 inches and 3 inches deep, and divided into two loaves, so that they may be separated at the fair. The loaf must be baked with Cream of the West Flour. One-half will be judged at the fair. The other half of the prize loaf will be sent to Ontario Agricultural College, Guelph, to compete in the District Contests. The judging will be done by Miss M. A. Purdy, of the Department of Breadmaking and Flour Testing. The local contest at the fair will be conducted under the same rules as all the other regular contests at your fairs.

The Standard by which bread will be judged will be as follows:

1. Appearance of Loaf ....15 marks
   (a) Color ....5 marks
   (b) Texture of crust ....5 marks
   (c) Shape of loaf ....5 marks
2. Texture of Crumb ....40 marks
   (a) Evenness ....15 marks
   (b) Silkiness ....20 marks
   (c) Color ....5 marks
3. Flavor of Bread ....45 marks
   (a) Taste ....25 marks
   (b) Odor ....20 marks

Important.—Each loaf must be accompanied by the part of the flour bag containing the face of the Old Miller, and an entry form must be signed by the girl and parents or guardian stating date of birth, P.O. address, and giving name of dealer from whom Cream of the West Flour was purchased. The form will state that the girl actually baked the loaf entered in the competition. The forms will be provided at the time of the fair. The decision of the judges is final. Not more than one entry may be made by each girl and not more than one local prize will be awarded to the same family.

Which District is Yours?—This list shows you which counties you compete against if you become a competitor for the District prizes:

District No. 1.—[illegible] of Glengarry, Stormont, Dundas, Grenville, Le[illegible] Frontenac, Lennox and Addington, Carleton, Lanark, Re[illegible]ew.

District No. 2.—[illegible]ies of Hastings, Prince Edward, Peterboro, Northumber[illegible]nd, Victoria, Durham.

District No. 3.—[illegible] of York, Ontario, Peel, Halton, Wentworth, Oxford, Brant, Waterloo (with a few fairs in Wellington and Perth).

District No. 4.—Counties of Welland, Haldimand, Norfolk, Elgin, Kent, Essex, [illegible]bton, Middlesex (with a few fairs in Huron and Lincoln).

District No. 5.—Counties of Bruce, Grey, Dufferin, Simcoe, Districts of Muskoka, Parry Sound, Temiskaming, Algoma, Manitoulin.

THE RESULTS of the contests at the fair will be made known in the usual way as in the case of all the other regular contests. The District results will be announced as soon as possible after the conclusion of the Rural School Fairs in the Province.

Advertising!

in its highest sense is the creation of a new want and providing the means with which to apply that want. The aim of Advertising is not to spread the name of a firm so much as to get business for that firm. The ad. that counts is the one that makes the luxuries of today the necessities of tomorrow. A great many people advertise as they give to charity—merely to get rid of a solicitor. Then the advertiser says it doesn't pay and when done in that spirit it does not. Advertisers must put brain and selling force into their their copy, and when this is done they find that advertising is not an expense, but the finest kind of an investment. —S. C. Dobbs, past president Associated Advertising Clubs of America.

Borden Government's Bill Will Deprive About 200 Bruce Citizens of Their Franchise.

The Telescope has ascertained that 80 naturalized Canadian citizens living in Bruce County will be deprived of the right to vote in the coming Dominion Elections by Sir Robert Borden's War-time Election Act. These 80 names form the list of naturalized aliens who were born in enemy countries and were not naturalized before the year 1902. There are 3 other citizens whose application for citizenship have been filed at the County Court House since the beginning of the War. Then there are quite a number of Bruce residents who have not applied for citizenship papers owing to the Court's Order holding up the enfranchisement of aliens. It is probably a safe estimate that two hundred people in Bruce will be deprived of their votes by the Borden Government, and of this number the great majority reside in South Bruce.

HOME FROM FIRING LINE

Two Returned Heroes Arrive at Walkerton Bearing Scars From the Great World Conflict.

Two Walkerton soldiers, Gnr. Jim Leech and Pte. Simon Small who have "done their bit" in bearing the brunt of battle arrived home Saturday night and were met by a large crowd of citizens at the Station. Both men look much like their old selves but in reality both are indelibly branded by the hardships they have passed through.

Gunner Leech has been in khaki since the beginning of the war. He went over with the 16th Guelph Battery and saw long hard fighting under the bad trench conditions which prevailed at the beginning of the war. After 18 months of it he contracted a bad case of bronchitis and was sent back to England. In spite of his long service, Gnr. Leech, who is also a South African veteran, is game to go back and help finish the job if the authorities will let him.

Pte. Simon Small, who is a native of Walkerton, enlisted with the 34th Batt. in 1916 and went to England with the second draft. In a short time he got to the trenches and saw 10½ months of the real thing at the Front. He was then sent back to England just a year ago as a result of shell-shock which affected his heart. Before leaving England Simon took a trip to Wittley Camp and saw many of his old Walkerton chums now in the 160th.

A public reception will be given the two returned soldiers at the Town Hall this evening at 8 o'clock

Mass Meeting of Women.

A Mass Meeting of all the Women of South Bruce will be held in the Town Hall, Walkerton, on Monday Sept. 24th at 2.30 p. m. The object of this meeting is to discuss ways and means of conserving wheat, beef and bacon for the Allies. Prominent out-side speakers will address the gathering and Mrs. William Little of Teeswater will occupy the Chair.

THE TOWN COUNCIL

Will Pass a By-law to Regulate Street Traffic—Declines to Build Sewer on Campbell St. This Year.

The Town Council held its regular monthly session for September on Monday night. Present; —Mayor Johnston, Reeve Russel, Coun. McCarter, Vogan, Sanderson, McGregor.

Chief Ferguson reported $8.75 court fees collected for the month of August.

Treasurer A. Collins asked that the Mayor and Treasurer be authorized to borrow $8,000 from the Merchants Bank to meet expenditures. A by-law was passed to that effect.

On motion of Couns. Vogan and McCarter, the Council decided to lay a cement sidewalk on the south side of Durham Street, four feet wide together with crossings between Alma and Elizabeth Sts. 60 per cent of the cost to be paid by the property owners and 40 per cent by the municipality.

Ninian Crawford was reappointed tax collector for 1917 at $200 salary, an increase of $50.

Alex Haas and several other property owners on Campbell St. appeared to urge the Council to take action regarding their petition for a sewer which had been presented in the spring. In other towns and cities, said Mr. Haas, they build sidewalks and sewers out into the country to induce people to build houses. Here the Council would not even give sewer connection after the new houses are built. He had built a new house on Campbell St. and it would bring the town $46 additional revenue next year. The Streets Committee, after considering the matter, recommended that as no expenditure for sewers had been included in the estimates for 1917, it would be inadvisable to construct any sewers this year but suggested that the Council deal with the matter early next year.

The Council decided to accept Reeve Russel's suggest to draft a traffic by-law for Walkerton.

Couns. Vogan and McCarter moved that the Streets Committee prepare a traffic by-law to be ready for the next regular meeting.

Mr. Collins said he had inquired from officials of several municipalities where Traffic By-laws had been introduced and all said that they had had excellent results.

GETTING READY TO START

Mr. Frank Rennie of Brant is Judge Klein's Appointee to the Conscription Tribunal for Walkerton District.

A telegram was received by His Honor Judge Klein last week from Mr. E. L. Newcombe, Deputy Minister of Justice, notifying him that local tribunals, under the Military Service Act, would be located at the following places in Bruce County: Walkerton, Lucknow, Kincardine, Paisley, Port Elgin, Wiarton, Tara, Lion's Head.

The instructions accompanying the list of places asked that Judge Klein proceed with the appointment of a member for each local tribunal. The other member (there are two in each case) is to be named by the Selecting Committee at Ottawa, the latter being named by the leaders of the two parties at Ottawa. Members of the local tribunals are to be, as far as possible, residents of the community in which they are to act.

It is expected that proclamations will be issued within the next few days calling upon the first class to report within a certain time and if exemption is asked for, the cases will be heard as quickly as possible by these tribunals.

A full announcement with reference to the matter may be expected next week and machinery for the enforcement of the Act may be in motion in a very short time. No declaration as to who would be exempt has been made but "those engaged in the essential industries" will be exempt to a certain extent. It is taken that fishermen, farmers, machinists, and a few other trades and professions will be designated as "essential."

We understand that Mr. Frank Rennie, farmer, of Brant, will be named by Judge Klein to sit for Walkerton district, along with one commissioner named by the government. The appointees in Bruce will not likely be lawyers. Judge Klein will endeavor to choose laymen like Mr. Rennie, relying upon their good sound judgment, rather than legal training.

(LATER)

Judge Klein has been instructed by the Deputy Minister of Justice to name one or two men in each locality from whom the Minister of Justice can choose one in case the first man appointed becomes incapacitated to act.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

THE Franchise Bill which the Borden Government is at present jamming through the House of Commons is a bare-faced attempt to win the election by wholesale disenfranchisement of a class of people who are entitled to the same rights and privileges as every Canadian citizen but who, the gov't. fears, will vote against Borden if not barred from the ballot box. Aliens who took out citizenship papers in Canada thereby entered into a solemn covenant with the government but our kaiserlike government will not be stopped by a mere "scrap of paper." If Sir Thos. White were to repudiate the country's financial obligations we would hold up our hands in holy horror but such action would be infinitely less dishonorable than the Borden proposal to cancel the sacred rights of citizenship enjoyed by thousands of Canadian citizens. The government's policy breeds disunion which it may take generations to overcome.

THE statement is made in Toronto that it now costs $2.50 per day for the maintenance of each patient in the Toronto General Hospital. So hard has the big infirmary been struck by the ever-increasing cost of living one official has expressed the view that unless additional assistance be forthcoming from the civic treasury it may be necessary for the hospital to go out of business until the close of the war. Circumstances such as these indicate why local hospitals are having difficulty in meeting expenses these times.

THE local hotels are observing Hon. Mr. Hanna's command and are not serving bacon or beef Tuesdays and Fridays. The ordinary householder had reached that point long ago.

NO one in Canada has done more to speed up production for the war this summer than the farmer's wife and yet Sir Robert Borden says she shall not vote.

THANKSGIVING DAY has been set for October 8th. The present Parliament expires October 7th; so there will be at least one cause for thanksgiving.

THE Borden Government has no respect for a "scrap of paper". The solemn pledge of citizenship is cancelled by one stroke of the pen.

IN repudiating the pledged word of Canada to our thousands of alien-born citizens the Borden Government shows us partyism at its worst.

WHAT has become of that investigation of the cold-storage companies? Has it adjourned until after the war?

AIR RAIDERS OVER PINKERTON

(Contributed.)

Sept. 7th, 1917, will long be remembered by the residents of Pinkerton as the date of the first air raid over is quiet and unsensational village.

Strange thumping sounds fell on the ears of nearly all the villagers and dwellers on the countryside, some thinking it was only the passing of the product of Henry Ford, but to the amazement of those who put in practise the Divine injunction of looking up, was it seen to be none other than six birds of passage, piloted by human hands. Those of us who did not cast our eyes upward failed to see this strange flight and therefore failed to be among the number who witnessed the passing of the first aeroplanes in His Majesty's Service over the village of Pinkerton.

These planes circled around for a little, much to the delight of many and to the consternation of a few. One of our village guards felt an impulse to get his rifle, and had he turned his anti-air gun on these strange creatures of the clouds, sad would have been their end, but they were allowed to pass unmolested, the eyes of the Empire—Moral, Lift up, Look up.

A trial subscription to the Telescope for the balance of the year will cost you only 50 cents.

GOING OVER THE TOP

Thrilling Letter From Bob Ferguson Gives Graphic Picture of the Real Thing in France.

A vivid description of "going over the top" in a Canadian drive against the German trenches is given in the interesting letter published herewith from Pte. Robert A. Ferguson, the eldest of Chief Ferguson's three sons in khaki. "Bob" enlisted at Salmon Arm B. C. and has been fighting in France for four months. Since writing this letter he has been wounded in the face and is now in No. 13 Base Hospital, France. The letter follows:—

July 4th, 1917.

Dearest Loving Wife:—

Thank God that I am spared to write this letter for we are just now back from a very hard six days trip in the line. They say we are to get a six weeks' divisional rest, but it is hard to say if we will or not. We went into the line on the 25th night and were supposed to go over the top at dawn, but owing to the heavy rain and mud we were too late relieving the other Battalion in the line, so the objective our company was to have taken was vacated by Fritz so we went right into that trench, then at 7 a. m. A. Co. went over, C. Co. following on our right and took their objective; Fritz also having vacated that trench too, they had no casualties. Then on the night of June 27th our Co., D., passed through A. Co. line and went out into "No Man's Land," one hundred yards or so in advance, and lay there and waited from twelve to two-thirty a. m. (dawn) for the dash over the top. While we lay there waiting for the two hours and a half was the worst, for old Fritz dropped quite a few whizz bangs pretty close to us. Then at the zero hour we were to advance over open ground four hundred and fifty yards and take Fritz's trench. To start with, just before leaving our own trench our platoon sergeant was wounded in both legs and could not come with us; then our officer seemed to have a hunch that he was not going to make it all the way, which he did not, being wounded half way over. To explain to you: the artillery puts on what we call a barage, that is, the guns all play on his front line for so many minutes, then it lifts and creeps back to his second and third line, all the time the extra big ones are playing farther back to stop any movement coming up and also on his guns. At the time the barage started we jumped up and steadily advanced as close as possible to our barage without getting hurt. There were shells of all sizes dropping, not in the thousand but millions. How anyone lived in it I do not know for we went so close into our own barage. We were all right where we stopped first and waited for it to lift, but some Sergeant yelled "come on," and we walked right into our own shells. I was second on the extreme left of No. 15 platoon. Three bombers, Murray, and myself and a little red-headed lad called Adrean, the latter dropping halfway over with a piece of shrapnel in his spine which paralyzed him from the hips down. Murray and I kept our space and distance fine so the corporal said of our section on the right. The rest of the platoon bunched up a little too much in the center, but you must remember it was a dark, cloudy morning, actually dark except for the flash of shells. Quite a few fell. We lost our officer half-way over. Such a sight I never saw, never will forget, or never wish to see again. I only got two little bits knocked off my knuckle from a piece that struck my rifle and glanced up over my hand, but I was blown head over heels backwards by a shell just as I reached Fritz's trench. There were still quite a few Fritzs left in the trench when we jumped in, that came out of the dugouts. We run across five just where I hit the trench—what was left of it. Murray bayonetted one, Reid shot one, the other three run and as I was a little more to the left I was not sure whether it was our boys or not till I saw the Fritz helmet then I shot one which caused the other two to jump back into the trench and we took them prisoners. So that was my first experience of over the top. I do not know how many prisoners in all were taken, but I do know we got four of his machine guns which is pretty good for a front line. At 7.10 in the evening of the same day, in broad day-light, we went over again, about 700 yards, but lucky Fritz had cleared out and gone across the river and we had no casualties. Had he still been there with his machine guns I do not think a man would have lived, for our artillery had not cut a strand of his barb wire which was twenty feet in solid depth. We had to look for his own gaps to get through and file through like sheep, but luck was with us and we got our objective. That was twice over the top for D. Co. in one day. Pretty stiff! We had about 34 in our platoon to start with, the rest being pretty near the same, but thank God, and Him only, that He spared me and brought me through safe and sound. Believe me, this war will put the fear into the hardest of men and bring them to their knees many a time. The Seaforths advanced in all over a mile. They were well pleased with our work. Fritz said we were specially picked troops that drove him back. Some feather for the Highlanders!

The number of our platoon is 15, which also was the boys that came out to rest. Quite a few of the Kelowna boys got it this time. I hope you are all well. I have not got any word from you now for some time. Do write often for I can not write as often as I would like to under the circumstances. I am well and thankful to God to be spared.

Tell Jack and Wilson not to be in any hurry to come over unless they have to, for it is a pretty sure napou finish, no more, sooner or later.

I walked over the ground as a stretcher party under the Red Cross Flag in daylight, and there was not hardly a foot of the ground that was not torn up.

I will close with heaps of love and kisses to all, from your old lonesome love.

BOB.

RULES OF THE ROAD

Are you the owner of a motor vehicle? Are you thoroughly conversant with the rules of the road?

Many people who drive cars have not taken the trouble to learn even the ordinary rules of the road, and when the police take them to task they feel deeply grieved. For the benefit of such are publishing a few of the more important provisions of the Motor Vehicles Act:

No motor vehicle shall be driven upon any highway within a city, town or village, at a greater rate of speed than twenty miles an hour.

No person under the age of 16 years shall drive a motor vehicle, and no person over the age of 16 and under the age of 18 years shall drive a motor vehicle on the highway unless and until such person has passed an examination and obtained a license provided for a person who drives a motor vehicle for pay hire, or gain.

Every motor vehicle must have markers attached in a position to be easily distinguished, and "the number shall be kept free from dirt and obstruction".

Where a person travelling on a highway in charge of a vehicle meets another vehicle he shall turn out to the right from the centre of the road, allowing the vehicle so met one-half of the road.

Where a person travelling or being upon a highway in charge of a vehicle or on horseback meets another vehicle or person on horseback at a crossroad or intersection, the vehicle or horseman to the right hand of the other vehicle of horseman shall have the right of way.

Where a person travelling or being upon a highway in charge of a vehicle or on horseback travelling at greater speed, the person so overtaken shall quietly turn out to the right and allow such vehicle to pass.

Where one vehicle is met or overtaken by another, if by reason of the weight of the load on either of the vehicles so meeting or of the vehicle overtaken the driver finds it impracticable to turn out, he shall immediately stop, and, if necessary for the safety of of the other vehicle, and if required to do so, he shall assist the person in charge thereof to pass without damage.

The penalties vary from $1 and costs to $20 and costs for a first offence, but no penalty or imprisonment shall be a bar to the recovery of damages by an injured person.

VOTER'S LIST 1917

Municipality of the Township of Greenock, County of Bruce

Notice is hereby given that I have transmitted or delivered to the persons in Sections 8 and 9 of the Ontario Voters' List Act the copies required by said sections to be so transmitted or delivered of the list made pursuant to said Act of all persons appearing by the last revised Assessment Roll of the said Municipality at elections for the Legislative Assembly and Municipal Elections and that the said list was first posted up at my office in Brant on the 18th day of August, 1917, and remains there for inspection and I hereby call on all voters to take immediate proceeding to have any errors or omissions corrected according to law.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson XII.—Third Quarter, For Sept. 16. 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, Dan. iii, 16-27. Memory Verses, 17, 18—Golden Text, Isa. xliii, 2—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

We shall not understand this third chapter of Daniel unless we have grasped in some measure the second chapter. The Bible must be studied as a whole, and each book as a whole, and yet each as an essential part of the whole revelation of God's eternal purpose by His Spirit. As the heavenly bodies of our solar system and all the systems in the universe move in circles, so is it also with God's heavenly truths. The last two chapters in the Bible complete the circle, which begins with the first two, telling of this earth without sin or sorrow or death. The third chapter from the end (Rev. xx) completes the circle which began with Gen. iii, telling of the great adversary, his beginning in relation to the earth and man and his end.

We have seen in recent lessons that we have come in the Bible story to the beginning of what is known as the times of the gentiles, but this book of Daniel covers the whole period and tells us of the end of those times, which we are now in the history of the world approaching or are already in.

In chapter ii we have God's revelation to Nebuchadnezzar of the whole period which began with Him and will end with the setting up of the kingdom of heaven after the times of the gentiles, a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, but shall stand forever, and these things are certain and sure (Dan. ii, 44, 45). In chapter vii we have the same period covered in a vision given to Daniel and ending in the same consummation (Dan. vii, 13, 14, 27). To a man of the world like Nebuchadnezzar the vision was fascinating, as are the things represented by gold and silver and brass and iron to such people, but to a man of God like Daniel the whole thing was represented by wild beasts devouring each other. Chapters iii and vi are another pair showing what it costs to stand for God in these evil times, while chapters iv and v are another pair showing how God will humble all pride, to bring to repentance if at all possible or, if not, to bring to everlasting punishment.

The vision of empire given to Nebuchadnezzar so affected him that instead of making him humble by the honor thus conferred upon him by the God of heaven he became filled with pride and had a great image of gold made and set up in the plain of Dura and caused all the people of his kingdom to assemble to worship it, threatening with death in the fiery furnace any who would dare to refuse to worship the image which he had set up. Now here is another strange circle of truth, for at the very end of the times of the gentiles during the last three and a half years after the church has been taken away there will be another image set up by the world power that shall then be, and all who will not worship that image shall be killed (Rev. xiii, 14-18). The pride and blasphemy of the king of Babylon are seen in such a saying as "Who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands?" (iii, 15.) But it will be exceeded by the blasphemy of the antichrist of the last days before he shall be sent alive to the lake of fire (Rev. xiii and xix, 19, 20). Of all the multitudes who were assembled on the plain of Dura that day only three young Jews dared to refuse to bow down to the image, and that was because they knew and worshiped the only Living and True God. When offered a second opportunity to bow down and thus spare their lives they most decidedly refused in the glorious words of verses 17, 18. May our hearts ever cry, "Our God whom we serve is able."

Bound in their clothing they were cast into the burning fiery furnace, which had been heated seven times hotter than usual, so that the flames slew the men who cast them in. But the three young men walked about in the furnace, unharmed, because the Son of God was with them, and they lost nothing but their bonds. I do most heartily believe what the king's counselors and great men saw when these three came out of the furnace—that there was no smell of fire upon them, nor was a hair of their head singed (verse 27). So it will be in the last days when some shall refuse to receive the mark of the beast or worship him (Rev. xv). See in verses 28-30 of our lesson how God was glorified in these men by the decree of the king that no one should dare to speak anything amiss against a God who could deliver in this way.

The only place where God was seen that day was in the burning fiery furnace, and when God allows any of His people to pass through fiery trials of any kind it is that He may be seen with us and in us, and He will fulfill the words of our Golden Text. In chapter iv we see this proud king humiliated, and the last word in his worldwide epistle is "Those that walk in pride He is able to abase" (iv, 37).

We would do well to adopt as our own the words of Paul in II Tim. iv, 18, "The Lord shall deliver me from every evil work and will preserve me unto His heavenly kingdom." We should remember also that it is the purpose of the Lord to stain the pride of all glory and bring into contempt all the honorable of the earth that the Lord alone may be exalted (Isa. xxiii, 9; ii, 11, 17).

It has just been discovered that stinkweed, so common in the western provinces has made its appearance in Huron county. Wm. Andrew who spent many years in the West and is quite familiar with the weed, discovered a plant of it in Stephen township. It was a healthy and vigorous special showing that it will grow and thrive in Ontario soil. It grows in rather bushy form, has very few leaves but bears an abundance of pods which contain anywhere from 10 to 20 seeds each. It was evidently given the name of stinkweed because of its offensive smell, resembling very much that of a skunk. Cattle sometimes eat it and whenever they do and it happens to be a milch cow the milk for days is not fit for use, neither is the cream fit for buttermaking. Mr. Andrews says it is the worst weed they have in the West, and he warns farmers to keep a strict watch over their fields and barn yards, particularly those farmers who have been using western grain for feed and seed purposes.—Goderich Star.

50 Years in Culross

A large concourse of people attended the funeral of the late Robert Murray at Teeswater. Mr. Murray was 86 years old and was born in Scotland. He came to this country with his parents and settled near Guelph where he married Miss Esther Kinsley who now survives him. After his marriage he bought a farm on the 15th concession of Culross where he farmed for nearly fifty years when he retired and moved to Teeswater.

Should Be Looked Into

A "Citizen" writing to The Walkerton Telescope complains that the condition of the cemetery set aside for the burial of the poor from the House of Refuge, is most forsaken and ill-kept. The letter states it is wild with weeds and not even levelled, and that rubbish is littered about. The writer also says that the last unfortunate to be buried there had not even the attendance of a clergyman and that the body was put into the grave by the hired man. If these conditions are true the people of this county should see that the reeves of the council are asked to enquire into this matter. The poor we have always with us, and those who are unfortunate enough to spend their last days in our house of refuge should be accorded a proper burial. The county as a whole should be glad to provide charity of the nature of a refuge for its old and feeble, who have none of this world's goods, and while some may desire to sit in judgment on the lives of those who have not been so fortunate as they, it is well to remember that. Stripes On Barber's Pole

How many of our readers can tell us what the stripes on the barber pole signify? You see the pole with its stripes and you know there is a barber shop back of the pole, but here the knowledge of the average person ceases. In the early days barbers did the bleeding for the community, and surgeons were not as plentiful as they are now. The first thing thought necessary, way down to the time of George Washington's death, was that any patient should be bled. Tap him, and take a few ounces of blood from him, no matter how weak he might be. When Washington was at the last gasp, the fools bled him. Well, the red stripes on a barber pole mean the red ribbon bandages that barbers bound over the wounds caused by the bleeding of people.

Your Watch Is a Compass

Most men who own a watch think they know all about it. They have the number fixed in their memory in case it is stolen. They could probably pick it out from five other watches with their eyes shut. But how many men know that their watch is a compass and will tell north from South as accurately as it will tell the time of day? Stanley, the explorer, did not know it until he had groped his way through the dark continent and met a Belgium sailor on the coast. Every watch is a compass. If you point the hour hand to the sun, the south is exactly half way between the hour and the figure XII on the dial. Suppose, for instance, it is 4 o'clock. Point the hand indicating 4 to the sun and the II on the watch is exactly south. If it is 8 o'clock, point the hand indicating 8 to the sun and the figure X on the dial is due south. No man need get lost if he carries a watch.

Brant Ladies Net Over $100.

The garden party held at the home of Mr. Thos. Cunningham of Maple Hill was a decided success, over $100 being netted by the ladies of the second concession to buy yarn to make comforts for the soldier boys of that district. A splendid program was given, Mr. John Rowland of Walkerton acting as chairman. Speeches were given by Dr. Mearns, Rev. W. I. McLean and Mr. John Taylor of Hanover; Mr. W. D. Cargill of Cargill; Reeve Willoughby of Brant and Mr. James McWhinney. Mr. Stevens of Chesley gave an excellent recitation. Miss Florence Rowland of Walkerton also contributed a recitation. Mr. A. S. Royce of Walkerton gave a solo. Miss Clara Inglis contributed a crochet hand bag which was auctioned off and brought $7.00, the buyer being Mr. Cargill. Mrs. Thos. Cunningham gave a cushion, which brought $15 under the hammer the purchaser being Mr. McTavish of Toronto. Mr. John Purvis acted as auctioneer.

A MEMORY OF EARL GREY

The famous pass in the Purcell Mountain Range. Earl Grey inset.

Earl Grey at his hunting cabin near Lake Windermore, B.C.

AN interesting point has never yet been decided as to the permanent name to be given to the pass which leads over the Purcell Range between Lake Windermere and Argenta on the Upper Kootenay Lake. The late Earl Grey, who had a hunting cabin half way up the pass on Toby Creek crossed the pass on one occasion, with the result that the geographers named it after him. The original discoverer of the pass, however, was a prospector named Wells, and Earl Grey, who was always a thorough sportsman, wrote saying that he thought it a hardship to deprive Wells of the right to the old name of Wells Pass. To-day, however, the name of Earl Grey's Pass is still current, and remains in most of the maps. The British Columbia Government commenced to build a road over it, which, however, was badly damaged in the great washouts of 1915. This summer two venturesome tourists made the crossing though at considerable hardship owing to the condition of the trail at Hammill Creek, on the western side. The following account of the trip appeared in the "Kootenian," of Kaslo B.C.:

"After a trip that they will not forget in a hurry, Dr. R. N. Carter of Rossland, and Henry Cody of this city arrived in town on Wednesday of last week, after a somewhat dangerous jaunt across Earl Grey's Pass, and through Hammill Creek canyon. They had left Wilmer, in East Kootenay, about ten days before and made their way up the Toby Creek wagon road to the summit, and put in about one day exploring the huge Toby Creek ice field. Mr. Cody was well acquainted with the country up there, having mineral claims on the East Kootenay side, upon which he has been doing assessment work for years. The ground was not new to him, but it was virgin territory to the doctor. The latter stated that he had never before seen such magnificent mountain scenery. Having travelled a good deal over the surface of the globe, he is in a pretty good position to judge as to what constitutes the real thing in the line of mountain scenery.

"He found the Toby Creek glacier a particular inspiring and wonderful spectacle. They spent a day on top of this huge lake of ice, and only had a look over one corner of it. They started out in the early morning to promenade upon it, and walked for four hours steady, the going being rather good except for working around some of the crevasses, and in the four hours' stroll arrived at the conclusion that they had not gone half way across it. So they returned to the camp. Beyond the risk of falling off a precipice or looping the loop down the side of a mountain, there was not a great deal of danger to the trip until they worked their way down on this side of the pass and began to come down Hammill Creek. The trip from the pass down was made in a driving rain, with the bushes soused with water, so that they were soaking wet in a few minutes after leaving the timber line. The trail in places was so overgrown that it could scarcely be followed. A number of new slides had come down lately and piled the bottom of the valley with various debris, so that progress was at times necessarily slow. They managed to get through to the Argenta Mines compressor building and camped at that point over night. The following day was one of hardship, and extreme peril at times. Between the point on the Hammill Creek road where the trail to the St. Patrick group branches off, and the Argenta Mines compressor, all semblance of a road was wiped out entirely in places through the depths of the fiercely savage Hammill Creek canyon. Several times they had to improvise bridges to cross the roaring stream, said bridges being nothing but a convenient tree, which was felled with an axe. As Hammill Creek varies all the way from forty to eighty feet wide and as the fallen trees sometimes sagged down into the teeming torrent, the peril of such crossings can be better imagined than described, more particularly in view of the fact that both men had heavy packs on their backs, that of Cody's weighing some sixty-five pounds.

"At last, however, they gained the point on the canyon road where the trail branches off to the St. Patrick group, and from there on, comparatively speaking, the going was like unto that of a paved street. In due time they reached Argenta, and from that point were rowed over to Lardo, where they connected with the barge "Empress" and came to town."

Citizens Saw Aeroplanes

A squad of six aeroplanes from Camp Borden flew over this section of Country on Friday afternoon, in a westerly direction. The machines passed Durham and Hanover and Pinkerton, two of them coming within sight of Walkerton at a couple of thousand feet. All six alighted in a field at Black Horse, fifteen miles west of Walkerton. On rising to continue their journey two of the machines were damaged, one of them landing in an apple tree, and the engine of another going dead, causing it to crash in a field beside the road. Long distance communication with Camp Borden was established and mechanics with motor trucks were sent out to bring in the machines. One of the motor trucks spent over night Sunday at Walkerton and crowds of people flocked to see the damaged airplane on the truck in the hotel yard.

The planes which took part in the flight, were piloted by American Aviators from the Aviation Branch, American Signal Corps, who are training with the Royal Flying Corps at Camp Borden.

Vision Your Sons, Mothers of Canada!

Vision them at early morning when through the rising mists, there bursts a hurricane of fire---

See your valiant boys---calm, grim, but cheerful, "stand-to-arms" until the Hun's "morning hate" dies away.

Picture them at breakfast, the meal that must bring them the bodily sustenance to carry them through the strain of another day.

Then think what might happen if, one morning, there was no breakfast ---no food, and word went down the lines that Canada had failed them.

Vision all these things, and then--- as Women of Canada---Mothers of Men---Answer this Call to Service.

Canada must send to Her Own, and to the Allies Fighting Forces, more wheat, more beef, more bacon, and more of such other foods as are non-perishable and easily exported.

Canada can do this without depriving her own population of a fair share of any of these foods if You Women will but help.

All we ask of you is, that instead of buying so much white flour (if you do your own baking) you vary your baking by using one-third oatmeal, corn, barley or rye flour. Or, if you buy your bread, that you order a certain proportion of brown bread each day.

Second, instead of using as much beef and bacon as formerly, you vary your family's diet, by substituting for beef and bacon such equally nutritious foods as fish, peas, lentils, potatoes, nuts, bananas, etc.

Third, and this is most important, ---positively prevent the waste of a single ounce of food in your household.

They Must Be Fed

Statistics show that, everyday, in Canada, sufficient food is thrown into garbage cans to feed the entire Canadian Overseas Army.

Travellers have often remarked that many a European family would live well upon the quantity and quality of food wasted in some Canadian homes.

Such waste is shameful at any time; but in these times it is criminal.

Our only hope is that with these truths before you, and in view of the vital issues at stake, we may count upon your earnest co-operation in stopping this appalling waste; and in substituting other foods for the wheat, beef and bacon that must be sent overseas.

Next week a Food Service Pledge and Window Card will be delivered to you. It is your Dedication to War Service. The Window Card is your Emblem of Honour.

Woman's Auxiliary, Organization of Resources Committee, in Co-operation with The Hon. W. J. Hanna, Food Controller.

Mr. and Mrs. James Shera and Mrs. James Hooey motored over from Gorrie on Monday. Mrs. Hooey will visit friends in town for a few days.

Miss Kate Schwalm has resumed her duties as teacher in the junior room of the Public School.

Rev. A. W. Geild preached an excellent sermon in the Methodist church last Sunday evening on the subject, "The Use of Money."

Dr. Clapp and Miss Pauline of Walkerton were visitors in town on Saturday September 8th.

Don't forget the Mildmay Fall Fair Sept. 17 and 18th. It will be well worth coming to this year.

A Ford automobile belonging to a fellow from Teeswater run amuck on the road near Will Lewis' west of the town on Sunday morning and almost turned turtle before it stopped. Five young men were in the machine but none were hurt beyond a scratch.

PINKERTON

Mr. Jas. Gale of Alma spent Sunday with his parents at the Manse.

Rev. J. A. MacIntosh of Toronto is enewing acquaintances in the village and vicinity.

Senator and Mrs. Donnelly, Misses Mertis and Nellie Donnelly motored to Ashfield last week to attend the marriage of Miss Nellie Garvey.

Tom Garland is attending Business College in Toronto.

School reopened on Tuesday with Miss. Florence Diehl of Paisley in charge.

Mr. and Mrs. T. Birrell and Wes. Birrell motored to Bradford to attend the funeral of Mrs Birrell's brother.

Mrs. Jas. McGee of Paisley visited in the village last week.

Mr and Mrs. T. Cummins, Mrs. Elliot and daughter Grace of Molesworth spent a few days at Mrs. J. Murray's.

The memorial service for Pte. John McAfee on Sunday last, was largely attended, many members from other denominations being present, Rev. Mr. Gale preached an excellent discourse and the Rev. Mr Storey of the Methodist Church led in prayer. The church was suitably draped and decorated and special music was provided.

Herb Pearson spent Sunday at his home here.

John Seiler and wife visited the county town Monday of this week.

Considerable excitement was caused this week by the unusual sight of a flock of six aeroplanes passing overhead. If any of our readers desire to know just who they were, we would suggest their consulting Miss Martha Fordyce who had her field glasses trained on them. Alex McKeeman still swears they were ducks.

Since the station was burned down on Sept 2nd, a couple of cars have been moved in. One of the latter is being used for a freight shed and one for a waiting room and office. Communication by wire and phone have been installed. It is hoped a new station will be built shortly.

W. Fair spent Sunday at his home here.

HANOVER

Mrs. E. M. Langley received a telegram from Ottawa on Saturday informing her that her son Goodwin, had been shell gassed and was in hospital.

Mr. J. C. Devlin received a telephone message that his brother, James, had died at St. Thomas and he went to attend the funeral. Deceased was borne and raised in Hanover, leaving here about 30 years ago. He was about 50 years of age and a bachelor.

Several letters received from England state that Capt. or Lieut. Linton Douglas has gone to France and that a number of other officers including Lieut. Helwig and Major Eaton expect to go to France shortly. A number of the men who have been ill in England are expected to return to Canada shortly for further treatment.

BRANT AVENUE

The weather having been fine the past week or so, every farmer was as busy as could be at harvesting and very little grain is left out now and as a result almost every farmer has a grain stack out waiting for the threshing machine.

Some of the agriculturalists on this avenue sure did rush in the grain last week as one of the industrous had ten men and three wagons going for two days and another one had eleven men working for a few days. It pays to work like that.

Quite a few of the available townsmen heard the farmers call for more "help" and responded quite liberally to do their "bit" with the producers.

Irwin Bros. who purchased the splendid 100 acre farm from Mr. Wm. Riley a short time ago have already ploughed three large fields since harvest and are preparing for a bumper crop for 1918.

The threshing machines are humming in every direction now and some record-breaking yields are to be seen. Good and well for Canada needs all we can produce to help win the war.

Mr. Wm. McCarter, brakeman of the G. T. R. spent Sunday at his home near town.

Mr. Walter Blackwell of near Bervie was a Sunday visitor at Mr. Wm. Long's.

Two of the popular young ladies on this Ave have started to work on the "fall millinery" at the Elite Parlor in town. This chilly weather makes them think of looking for a winter hat as it will soon be here.

Mr. Jack Lundy & Son came near disolving partnership last week as Ed. had made up his mind to help harvest the "Western Crop" but Jack said that he can't do all the work alone besides the junk business so Ed. finally decided to stay home another year and help Daddy.

Those four frosts last week have colored some of the corn and other delicate roots and vegetables. It's rather early in the season yet for heavy frosts.

Miss Kate Sutter and friend visited the former's sister, Mrs. Andrew Zettler on Sunday. Miss Sutter left on Wednesday for St. Catherines to resume her duties after spending a few weeks at her home.

Last Friday afternoon two aeroplanes passed through here eastward and everybody stopped, looked and listened to see if they weren't some German spies looking over our country.

Two of Mr. J. J. Zettler's daughter had their tonsils removed last week and are getting along nicely.

Miss Florence Riley and brother, Lloyd spent Sunday with their aunt at Hanover.

The sad news reached here last week that Pte. David McCarter received a severe wound in his foot lately. We wish him a speedy recovery.

Mr. J. McPhail and sister Bella of Otter Creek autoed to James McCarter's on Sunday and spent a pleasant time.

OTTER CREEK

Mr. Wilfred Miller of Alsfeldt visited relatives here over Sunday.

The community witnessed an unusual sight when six aeroplanes passed over here.

Miss Tillie and Master Harry Hickling returned home from their visit to Hanover and Elmwood.

CARGILL

Mrs. Cameron entertained a few friends on Friday evening.

Quite a number of farmers have completed their harvest and all boast of a bumper crop.

Sheriff Jermyn of Wiarton spent Monday in town.

Jno. Montgomery has purchased a fine new Chevrolet car.

Mrs. Powers has moved from Brick St. over to Red St. this week.

The local Bowling Club are holding a tournament in aid of the Red Cross on Sept. 20th. Everybody come and help the good work along.

Wm. Russell caught the largest pike that was ever hauled in from the Saugeen the other day, it weighing 13½ lbs.

Mr. and Mrs. Kaufmann are visiting from Toronto, with their daughter, Mrs. Wm. Russell.

Miss Marjorie Hood is spending her vacation in Hamilton.

Dr. Bricker spent a couple of days in Toronto. He was accompanied on his return by Mrs. Bricker who has been spending a few weeks with her parents.

BORN—On Sunday Sept. 2nd, to Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Colwell, a daughter.

Wedding bells are ringing up west of our burg.

Acquitted By Judge

Theodore and W. D. Seaman, who own a sawmill at Sauble Falls, were tried by Judge Greig at County Court on Saturday on a charge of stealing cedar shingles from James Walker, an Amabel farmer. Walker took a quantity of cedar timber to Seaman's mill last winter to have it made into shingles and he claimed that the Seamans sold a quantity of the shingles to another party, some 32 thousand being missing. Evidence was lacking to prove the charge, and the Judge acquitted the defendants, who were defended by D. Robertson K. C.

News About Town

Fingers Caught in Coupling

Joseph Cloe, C. P. R. brakemen, had his hand badly jammed while coupling a freight car to the engine at the C. P. R. yards Monday night. The middle finger was jammed to a pulp, requiring to be amputated and two other fingers badly bruised.

Deaths at House of Refuge

Three inmates passed away at the House of Refuge during the past week and by a strange coincidence all three were of the same age—seventy-five and all died from the same cause, senility. Charles McKnight, who was called away on the 9th inst. was an old resident of Bruce Tp. Miss Jane Crandon, whose death occurred on the 6th inst. was a native of Malcolm McKeever, an old fisherman of Southampton, died on the 10th inst. He had been blind for many years and was an inmate ever since the building was opened 18 years ago.

Death of Mrs. Mogk

A very sad death took place at the home of Mr. and Mrs. George Fisk of Brant, on Tuesday morning, when their beloved daughter, Mrs. Lenora Mogk, wife of Jacob Mogk, died during childbirth. The deceased was a woman of sterling qualities beloved by all. She was in her thirty-nineth year, and besides her husband, leaves two little sons, aged 10 and 5 years respectively. John H. Fisk, foreman at the Walkerton Egg & Dairy plant, is an only brother, and Mrs. Wm. Lambertus of Dunkeld is an only surviving sister. The funeral takes place this afternoon from the parents' home in Brant to the Walkerton Cemetery. Rev. Mr. Twitmye, Lutheran pastor of Hanover, will conduct the service.

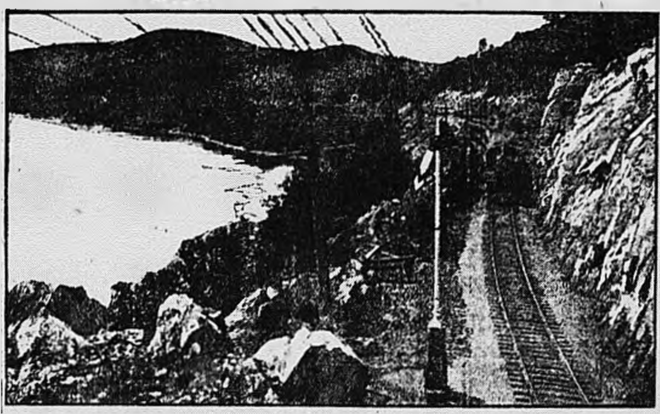
Leaving Cargill

Cargill is to lose an estimable citizen shortly in Mr. C. W. Keeling, who with his wife, is leaving shortly to spend the Fall and winter in California and may reside there permanently. Mr Keeling has been a resident of Cargill for 37 years, and a general merchant in that village for many years. He has been active in the work of the Methodist Church and prominent in all movements for the good of the community. Mr. and Mrs. Keeling have not been in good health for some time, and the recent sale of the business to Hunstein and Wittich of Mildmay, leaves them free to enjoy a rest. Their son, Lieut. Lorne Keeling is with the Divisional Signallers at Ottawa and may soon proceed overseas. He was principal of Southampton Public School up till a year ago. Miss Keeling is a member of the teaching staff in Oakville public school.

BORN

SCHLORFF—In Carrick, on Tuesday Sept. 11th, 1917, to Mr. and Mrs. Louis Schlorff, a son.

COAL and FENNIMORE COOPER



D. & H. Line.—Cliffs on shore of Lake Champlain.

"The Split," on Lake Champlain, is Canada's old frontier.

THE great industrial wealth and the wonderful historic interest of the country served by the Delaware & Hudson Company give especial interest to the linking up of this company with the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is the country of anthracite coal, and it is the country of Fennimore Cooper, whose tales of the French and Indian wars are known to every schoolboy. In spite of Mark Twain's joke, that the Indians of Fennimore Cooper were an ancient tribe that never existed, the country round Glen Falls, Lake George, Otsego Lake, and Fort William Henry is dotted with localities identified with the Last of the Mohicans, and Leather Stocking. The hunting and fishing grounds of the Five Nations and the Algonquins are now famous hunting and fishing grounds for tourists, who find in this rugged lake and mountain scenery of the Adirondacks the scene of many a happy holiday. Coal is the industrial background of the D. & H. and the demand for coal in Canada to-day makes the value of the connection between this railway and the C. P. R. all the more apparent. It was to carry coal that the canal from Rondout on the Hudson to Honesdale, Pennsylvania, and the connecting gravity railroad from Carbondale to Honesdale were constructed. The "Stowbridge Lion," the first locomotive that ever turned a wheel on any railroad in North America, was imported by the Delaware & Hudson Company for use on its railroad making the first run on August 8, 1829, eighty-eight years ago. The canal was enlarged, and at one time carried 2,500,000 tons of coal annually, but in 1899 the greater convenience of rail haulage was realised and the canal abandoned.

Plattsburg, Westport on Lake Champlain, Ticonderoga, Lake George, Saratoga Springs, Troy, Albany, Binghampton, Scranton, and Wilkesbarre are some of the best known points on this important railroad. To Montrealers it is particularly well known as an exceptionally picturesque and comfortable route to New York, connection being made with the New York Central, so that passengers arrive at the Grand Central Depot in the heart of the great city.

THE CHIEF CHARM OF LOVELY WOMAN

Soft, Clear, Smooth Skin Comes With The Use Of "FRUIT-A-TIVES".

NORAH WATSON
86 Drayton Ave., Toronto.
Nov. 10th, 1915.

A beautiful complexion is a handsome woman's chief glory and the envy of her less fortunate rivals. Yet a soft, clear skin—glowing with health—is only the natural result of pure Blood.

"I was troubled for a considerable time with a very unpleasant, disfiguring Rash, which covered my face and for which I used applications and remedies without relief. After using "Fruit-a-tives" for one week, the rash is completely gone. I am deeply thankful for the relief and in the future, I will not be without "Fruit-a-tives".

GOLD

By

STEWART EDWARD WHITE

Copyright, 1913, by Doubleday, Page & Co.

in one thing—they had all been devised by men who had never seen any but manufactured gold. I may add that I never saw a machine of the kind actually at work in the diggings.

Just now, however, I looked on the owners of these contraptions with envy and thought ourselves at a disadvantage with only our picks, shovels and axes.

As we drew southward the days became insufferably warm, but the nights were glorious. Talbot and I liked to sleep on deck and generally camped down up near the bitts. The old ship rolled frightfully, for she was light in freight in order to accommodate so many passengers, and the dark blue sea appeared to swoop up and down beneath the placid tropic moon.

We had many long, quiet talks up there, but in them all I learned nothing, absolutely nothing, of my companion.

"If you had broken my arm that time I should not have taken you," he remarked suddenly one evening.

"Shouldn't blame you," said I.

"No! I wouldn't have wanted that kind of a man," he continued, "for I should doubt my control of him. But you gave up."

This nettled me.

"Would you have had me or any man brute enough to go through with it?" I demanded.

"Well"—he hesitated—"it was agreed that it was to be fight, you remember. And, after all, if you had broken my arm it would have been my fault and not yours."

Two young fellows used occasionally to join us in our swooping, plunging perch. They were as unlike as two men could be, and yet already they had become firm friends. One was a slow, lank, ague stricken individual from somewhere in the wilds of the great lakes, his face lined and brown as though carved from hard wood, his speed slow, his eyes steady with a veiled sardonic humor. His companion was scarcely more than a boy, and he came, I believe, from Virginia. He was a dark, eager youth, with a mop of black shiny hair that he was always tossing back, bright glowing eyes, a great enthusiasm of manner and an imagination alert to catch fire. The backwoodsman seemed attracted to the boy by this very quick and unsophisticated bubbling of candid youth, while the boy most evidently worshiped his older companion as a symbol of the mysterious frontier. The northerner was named Rogers, but was invariably known as Yank. The southerner had some such name as Fairfax, but was called Johnny and later in California, for reasons that will appear, Diamond Jack. Yank's distinguishing feature was a long barreled "pea shooter" rifle. He never moved ten feet without it.

Johnny usually did most of the talking when we were all gathered together. Yank and I did the listening and Talbot the interpellating. Johnny swarmed all over himself like a pickpocket and showed us everything he had in the way of history, manners, training, family, pride, naivete, expectations and hopes. He prided himself on being a calm, phlegmatic individual, unemotional and not easily excited, and he constantly took this attitude. It was a lovely joke.

"Of course," said he, "it won't be necessary to stay out more than a year. They tell me I can easily make $1,100 a day. But, you know, I am not easily moved by such reports"—he was at the time moving under a high pressure, at least ten knots an hour—"I shall be satisfied with three hundred a day. Allowing 300 working days to the year, that gives me about $90,000—plenty!"

"You'll have a few expenses," suggested Talbot.

"Oh—yes—well, make it a year and a half, just to be on the safe side."

Johnny was eagerly anxious to know everybody on the ship with the exception of about a dozen from his own south. As far as I could see, they did not in the slightest degree differ except in dress from any of the other thirty or forty from that section, but Johnny distinguished. He stiffened as though Yank's gun barrel had taken the place of his spine whenever one of these men was near, and he was so coldly and pointedly courteous that I would have slapped his confounded face if he had acted so to me.

"Look here, Johnny," I said to him one day, "what's the matter with those fellows? They look all right to me. What do you know against them?"

"I never laid eyes on them before in my life, sir," he replied, stiffening perceptibly.

"Take that kink out of your back," I warned him. "That won't work worth a cent with me!"

He laughed.

"I beg pardon. They are not gentlemen."

"I don't know what you mean by gentleman," said I. "It's a wide term. But lots of us here aren't gentlemen. Far, far from it. But you seem to like us."

He knit his brows.

"I can't explain. They are the class of cheap politician that brings into disrepute the chivalry of the south, sir."

Talbot and I burst into a shout of laughter, and even Yank, leaning attentively on the long barrel of his pea rifle, grinned fatally. We caught Johnny up on that word, and he was game enough to take it well. Whenever something particular had happened to be also southern we called it the chivalry. The word caught hold, so that later it came to be applied as a generic term to the southern wing of venal politicians that early tried to control the new state of California.

I must confess that if I had been Johnny I should have stepped more carefully with these men. They were a dark, suave lot and dressed well. In fact, they and a half dozen obviously professional men alone in all that ship wore what we would call civilized clothes. I do not know which was more incongruous, our own red shirts or the top hats, flowing skirts and light pantaloons of these quietly courteous gentlemen. They were quite as well armed as ourselves, however, wearing their revolvers beneath their armpits or carrying short double pistols. They treated Johnny with an ironically exaggerated courtesy and paid little attention to his high airs. It was obvious, however, that he was making enemies.

Talbot Ward knew everybody aboard, from the captain down. His laughing, half aloof manner was very taking, and his ironical comments on the various points of discussion somehow conveyed no sting. He was continually accepting gifts of newspapers—of which there were a half a thousand or so brought aboard—with every appearance of receiving a favor. These papers he carried down to our tiny box of a room and added to his bundle. I supposed at the time he was doing all this on Moliere's principle, that one gains more popularity by accepting a favor than by bestowing one.

In the early morning one day we came in sight of a round, high bluff with a castle atop, and a low shore running away. The ship's man told us this was Chagres.

This news caused a curious disintegration in the ship's company. We had heretofore lived together a good humored community. Now we immediately drew apart into small suspicious groups. For we had shortly to land ourselves and our goods and to obtain transportation across the isthmus, and each wanted to be ahead of his neighbor.

Here the owners of much freight found themselves at a disadvantage. I began to envy less the proprietors of those enormous or heavy machines for the separation of gold. Each man ran about on the deck collecting hastily all his belongings into one pile. When he had done that he spent the rest of his time trying to extract definite promises from the harassed ship's officers that he should go ashore in the first boat.

Talbot and I sat on our few packages and enjoyed the scene. The ship came to anchor and the sailors swung the boat down from the davits. The passengers crowded around in a dense, clamoring mob. We arose, shouldered our effects and quietly slipped around to the corresponding boat on the other side the ship. Sure enough, that also was being lowered. So that we and a dozen who had made the same good guess, were, after all, the first to land.

We beached in the mud and were at once surrounded by a host of little, brown, clamorous men. Talbot took charge and began to shoot back Spanish at a great rate. Some of the little men had a few words of English. Our goods were seized and promptly disappeared in a dozen directions. I tried to prevent this, but could only collar one man at a time. All the Americans were swearing and threatening at a great rate. I saw Johnny, tearing up the beach after a fleet native, fall flat and full length in the mud, to the vast delight of all who beheld.

Finally Talbot plowed his way to me.

"It's all settled," said he. "I've made a bargain with my friend here to take us up in his boat to Cruces for $15 apiece for four of us."

"Well, if you need two more, for heaven's sake rescue Johnny," I advised. "He'll have apoplexy."

We hailed Johnny and explained matters. Johnny was somewhat put to it to attain his desired air of imperturbable calm.

"They've got every blistered thing I own and made off with it!" he cried. "Confound it, sir, I'm going to shoot every saddle colored hound in the place if I don't get back my belongings!"

"They've got our stuff, too," I added.

"Well, keep calm," advised Talbot. "I don't know the game down here, but it strikes me they can't get very far through these swamps, if they do try to steal, and I don't believe they're stealing anyway. The whole performance to me bears a strong family resemblance to hotel runners. Here, compadre!"

He talked a few moments with his boatman.

"That's right," he told us then. "Come on!"

We walked along the little crescent of beach, looking into each of the boats in the long row drawn up on the shore. They were queer craft, dug out from the trunks of trees, with small decks in bow and stern, and with a low roof of palmetto leaves amidships. By the time we had reached the end of the row we had collected all our effects. Our own boatman stowed them in his craft.

Thereupon, our minds at rest, we returned to the landing to enjoy the scene. The second ship's boat had beached, and the row was going on, worse than before. In the seething, cursing, shouting mass we caught sight of Yank's tall figure leaning imperturbably on his rifle muzzle. We made our way to him.

"Got your boat yet?" Talbot shouted at him.

"Got nothin' yet but a headache in the ears," said Yank.

"Come with us, then. Where's your plunder?"

Yank stooped and swung to his shoulder a small bundle tied with ropes.

"She's all thar," said he.

These matters settled, we turned with considerable curiosity to the village itself. It was all exotic, strange. Everything was different, and we saw it through the eyes of youth and romance as epitomizing the storied tropics.

Johnny and I wandered about completely fascinated. Talbot and Yank did not seem so impressed. Finally Talbot called a halt.

"This is all very well. If you kids like to look at yellow fever, blackjack and corruption, all right," said he. "But we've got to start pretty soon after noon, and in the meantime where do we eat?"

CHAPTER IV.

A Tropical River.

WE returned through the town. It was now filled to overflowing with our compatriots. They surged everywhere, full of comment and curiosity. The half naked men and women with the cigars and the wholly naked children and dogs seemed not in the least disturbed nor enlivened.

Talbot's earnest inquiries finally got us to the Crescent hotel. It was a hut exactly like all the rest save that it had a floor. From its name I suppose it must have been kept by a white man, but we never got near enough through the crowd to find out. Without Talbot we should have gone hungry with many others, but he inquired around until we found a native willing to feed us. So we ate on an upturned hencoop outside a native hut. The meal consisted of pork, bread and water.

We strolled to the beach at the hour appointed with our boatman. He was not there, nor any other boatman.

"Never mind," said Ward. "I'll know him if I see him. I'll go look him up. You fellows find the boat with our things in it."

He and I re-entered the village, but a fifteen minutes' search failed to disclose our man. Therefore we returned to the beach. A crowd was gathered close about some common center in the unmistakable restless manner of men about a dog fight or some other kind of a row. We pushed our way in.

Johnny and Yank were backed up against the palmetto awning of one of the boats in an attitude of deadly and quiet menace. Not two yards away stood four of our well dressed friends. Nobody as yet displayed a weapon, except that Yank's long rifle lay across the hollow of his left arm [illegible] of butt to earth, but it was [illegible] lightnings were playing. [illegible] man, who had appeared, alone [illegible] saying anything, but he seemed to be supplying language for the lot.

Johnny's tense, alert attitude relaxed a little when he saw us.

"Well?" inquired Ward easily. "What's the trouble?"

"Yank and I found our goods dumped out on the beach and others in their place," said Johnny.

"So you proceeded to reverse matters. How about it?" he inquired pleasantly of the four men.

"I know nothing about it," replied one of them shortly. "We hired this boat, and we intend to have it, and no whippersnapper is going to keep us from it."

"I see," said Talbot pleasantly. "Well, excuse me a moment while I talk to our friend." He addressed the man in Spanish and received short, sullen replies. "He says," Talbot explained to us, "that he never saw us before in his life and never agreed to take us up the river."

"Well, that settles it," stated the other man.

"How much did you offer to pay him?" asked Talbot.

The man stared. "None of your business," he replied.

"They're askin' $20 a head," volunteered one of the interested spectators.

"Exactly. You see," said Talbot to us, "we got here a little too early. Our bargain was for only $15, and now this worthy citizen has made a better rate for himself."

"You should have had the bargain immediately registered before the alcalde, senor," spoke up a white dressed Spaniard of the better class, probably from the castle.

"I thank you, senor," said Talbot courteously. "That neglect is due to my ignorance of your charming country."

"And now if you'll move, young turkey cock, we'll just take our boat," said another of the claimants.

"One moment!" said Talbot Ward, with a new edge to his voice. "This is my boat, not yours. My baggage is in it; my boatman is on the ground. That he is forgetful has nothing to do with the merits of the case. You know this as well as I do. Now, you can acknowledge this peacefully and get out or you can fight. I don't care a continental red copper which. Only, I warn you, the first man who makes a move with anything but his two feet will be shot dead."

He stood, his hands hanging idly by his sides, and he spoke very quietly. The four men were not cowards, that I'll swear, but one and all they stared into Ward's eyes and came individually to the same conclusion. I do not doubt that dancing flicker of refraction or of devilment was very near the surface.

"Of course, if you are very positive, I should not dream of doubting your word or of interfering," said the tallest and quietest, who had remained in the background. "We desire to do injustice to no man"—

Johnny, behind us, snorted loudly and derisively.

"If my knowledge of Spanish is of any value in assisting you to a boat, pray command me," broke in Ward.

The crowd moved off, the boatman with it. I reached out and collared him.

Talbot had turned on Johnny.

"Fairfax," said he icily, "one of the first things you must learn is not to stir things up again once a victory is gained. Those men were sore, and you took the best method possible of bringing on a real fight."

Poor Johnny flushed to the roots of his hair.

"You're right," said he in a stifled voice.

Talbot Ward thawed completely, and a most winning smile illumined his face.

"Why, that's what I call handsome, Johnny!" he cried. "It's pretty hard to admit the wrong. You and Yank certainly looked bold and warlike when he came along. Where's that confounded mozo? Oh, you have him, Frank! Good boy! Come here, my amiable citizen. I guess you understand English after all, or you couldn't have bargained so shrewdly with our blackleg friends."

"The first man who makes a move with anything but his two feet will be shot dead."

The flush slowly faded from Johnny's face. Yank's sole contribution to the changed conditions was to spit with great care and to shift the butt of his rifle to the ground.

"Now," Talbot was admonishing the boatman, "that was very bad. When you make a bargain stick to it. But [illegible] what I will do. I will ask [illegible] sabe, everywhere—your people [illegible] people—and if everybody pays $20, then we pay $20. Sabe? But we no pay $20 unless you get us to Cruces [illegible] pronto, sabe? Now we start."

The boatman broke into a torrent of talk.

"Says he's got to find his assistant," Talbot explained to us. "Come on, my son. I'll just go with you after that precious assistant."

We sat on the edge of our boat for half an hour, watching the most comical scenes. Everybody was afflicted with the same complaint—absence of boatmen. Some took possession and settled themselves patiently beneath their little roofs. Others made forays and returned dragging protesting natives by the arm. These generally turned out to be the wrong natives, but that was a mere detail. Once in a lucky while the full boat's complement would be gathered, and then the craft would pull away up the river to the tune of pistol shots and vociferous yells.

At the end of the period mentioned Talbot and the two men appeared. They were quite amicable—indeed, friendly—and laughed together as they came. The "assistant" proved to be a tremendous negro, nearly naked, with fine big muscles and a good natured, grinning face. He wore large brass ear circlets and bracelets of copper. We all pushed the canoe to the very edge of the water and clambered aboard. The negro bent his mighty shoulders. We were afloat.

Our padrone, as Talbot told us we should call him, stood in front clad in a colored muslin shirt. The broad sluggish river was alive with boats, all making their way against the current. By the time the lagoon had narrowed, however, they had pretty well scattered.

We entered a tropical forest, and never shall I forget the wonder of it. The banks were lined to the water's edge with vegetation, so that one could see nothing but the jungle. There were great palm trees, which we recognized, and teak trees, which we did not, but which Talbot identified for us. It was a very bald sort of tree, as I remember it. Then there were tremendous sycamores in which were ants' nests as big as beehives, and banana trees with torn leaves, probably the most exotic touch of all, and beautiful noble mangoes like domes of a green cathedral, and various sorts of canes and shrubs and lilies growing among them.

Our men paddled steadily ahead. The negro hummed strange minor songs to himself. Suddenly he flashed his teeth at us and broke into full voice:

Oh, Susannah, don't cry for me!
I'm off to California wid my banjo on my knee.

The accent was queer, but the words and tune were right. Talbot questioned him in Spanish.

"He says all Americans sing it. He has taken many up the river."

"Too many," muttered Johnny. "I wish we'd started three months sooner."

It was growing dusk when we came in sight of a village of bamboo huts on the right bank. To this we headed. Hardly had the boat struck the beach when both of our men leaped ashore and raced madly toward the huts, pausing only long enough to slide the boat beyond the grip of the river. We followed, considerably mystified. Quick as we were, we found both the padrone and his man, together with a dozen others, already seated at a monte table. The padrone was acting as banker!

We discovered the name of this place to be Gatun. Talbot found us a native hut in which were hammocks we could rent for the night. The hut was a two storied affair, with a notched pole by which to clamber aloft. I took one look and decided to stay below. My weight seemed sufficient to bring the whole thing down about our ears.

I do not know which had the better of it. My hammock was slung across one corner of the single room. A cooking fire blazed merrily five or six feet away. Some ten or a dozen natives were drinking and talking until nearly morning, and to my personal knowledge some ten or a dozen thousand fleas were doing the same. Six dogs were that hut's allowance. They discovered that my weight sagged my hammock down to a height just suitable for the rubbing of their backs. In vain I smote with boot or pistol barrel. They kiyied and departed, but only for a moment. I had not even time to fall into a doze before one of the others was back at it. This amused the drinking natives. I suppose the poor beasts very passionately wanted to scratch their backs. I could sympathize with them. None of them could have had as many fleas as I had, for their superficial area was not as great, but perhaps they had as many per square inch.

In the course of the night it began to rain. I mean really rain, "without going into details as to drops," as somebody has said. Then I ceased envying my friends upstairs, for from all sounds I judged the roof was leaking.

Next morning it was still drizzling. The town was full of sad eyed, wearied men. I think every one had had about the same experience. The padrone was at first a little inclined to delay, but he quickly recognized that our mood was bad, so shortly we were under way.

That day was not an unmitigated joy. It rained, picking the surface of the river up in little spots and rings. The forest dripped steadily. All the butterflies and bright birds had disappeared, and sullen, shifting clouds fairly touched the treetops. It was cold. Wrap ourselves as we would, we became thoroughly chilled.

CHAPTER V.

The Village in the Jungle.

THAT night we spent at a place called Pena Blanca, which differed in no essential from Gatun. We slept there in small sheds, along with twenty or thirty of our ship's companions wedged tightly together. A dozen other similar sheds adjoined. We were all quarrelsome and disinclined to take much nonsense either from the natives or from each other. Also we needed and wanted food, and we had difficulty in getting it. A dozen incipient quarrels were extinguished because the majority of the crowd would not stand for being bothered by the row.

The next day was clearing, with occasional heavy dashing showers, just to keep us interested. The country began more to open up. We passed many grass savannahs dotted with palms and a tree something like our locust. Herds of cattle fed there. The river narrowed and became swifter. Along in the early forenoon we reached bolder shores in which the trap rock descended sheer beneath the surface of the water. Directly ahead of us rose a mountain like a cone of verdure. We glided around the base of it and so came to Gorgona, situated on a high bluff beyond. This we had decided upon as the end of our river journey. To be sure we had bargained for Cruces, six miles beyond, but as the majority of our ship's companions had decided on that route we thought the Gorgona trail might be less crowded. So we beached our boat and unloaded our effects and set forth to find accommodations for the present and mules for the immediate future.

At first there seemed slight chance of getting either. The place was crowded beyond its capacity. The Hotel Francaise, a shed and tent sort of combination with a muddy natural floor, was jammed. The few native huts were crowded. Many we saw making themselves as comfortable as possible amid their effects out in the open. Some we talked with said they had been there for over a week, unable to move because of lack of transportation. They reported much fever, and, in fact, we saw one poor shaking wretch, wistful eyed as a sick dog, braced against a tree all alone. The spirit was drained out of him, and all he wanted was to get back.

While we were discussing what to do next our muslin clad ex-padrone, who had been paid and shaken by the hand some time since, approached smoking a longer cigar than ever. This he waved at us in a most debonair and friendly manner.

"Bread on the water," commented Talbot after a short conversation. "He says we have treated him like a brother and a true comrade in arms, which means that I did. You fellows, confound your spiteful souls, wanted to

Not Properly Trained

Among those who heard their country's call to "do their bit" at farming, was a retired brakeman. He was plowing up a piece of new land with a team of mules and had the reins fastened around his waist. Presently he saw a stump ahead, and instinctively he began giving the railroad "stop" signal with both hands. The plow struck the stump and the brakeman went head over heels. Picking himself up, he shook his fist at the mules and roared: You flop eared fools, don't you ever look back for a signal?"

Colt Roasted to Death

Richard Coghlin of Paisley lost a fine colt on the farm of Wm. Schotts, near Atwood, where it was pasturing, through a most startling cause. It was found dead in an old barn after it had been missing for a couple of days. The barn was used for the horses and cattle to go into for shade. This year it was necessary to use it for putting in hay. It is not known whether the animal was in the barn at the time the hay was put in, or whether it went in afterwards, as the doors were left open. However, it was discovered deep down in the hay on its back. It was nearly roasted from the heat of the new hay.—Paisley Advocate.

Successful Garden Party

The ladies of No 9 Division of the Brant Preparedness League are to be congratulated on the success of their garden party held at Mr. Justus Holm's on Friday night. The lovely grounds proved an ideal spot and in spite of the cool and threatening weather, a large crowd gathered. Lunch was served and an excellent program was given, the performers being:—Miss Florence Cunningham, Miss Hazel Irwin, Mr. Laidlaw and speeches by Mr. Rowland, Mr. Walter Findlay and Mr. Spence Nesbitt. Mr. Rowland acted as chairman and kept things lively. He auctioned off a patriotic quilt made by the women of the League, Mr. Steve Brocklebank being the purchaser at $10, and also sold the tasty cakes which had been made in the ladies best style. The Paisley Orchestra was present and delighted everybody. About $140 was realized for Patriotic purposes.

OUT IN MANITOBA

John D. Little of Brant Writes an Interesting Letter to Telescope Publisher From the Prairie Provinces.

We had a few lines this week from our friend, Mr. John D. Little of Brant, who is spending a few months in the Western Provinces. Telescope readers will be much interested in Mr. Little's careful sizing up of the crop situation in the part he has visited thus far. Mr. Little writes from Rathwell, Man., under date of Sept. 12th:—

I got here on Aug. 10th and have been around some. I have seen something of crops here. They vary from very poor to fairly good, but when you hear the kind of season they have had you wonder that there is any crop to cut. The spring was very cold, with frosts frequent and severe. In the first three weeks of June there was twelve nights frost, on two occasions forming ice half an inch thick. The last frost, June 21st, was the most severe of the lot. There was no rain here in June, but a light shower on July 6th and one later, is all the rain there has been to produce a crop, with the result that it varies all the way from weedy crop burned on the ground to wheat yielding 30 bus., oats 50 and barley 35 per acre. These top notches are far above the average. The threshing is getting well along and the average is about, wheat 12 bus., oats 25 and barley 20. I spent 24 days at Miami, south of here, a smart little place on the C. N. R. some 25 miles from the international boundary and five miles from the Pembina mountains. I was at the threshing on three farms here and the returns were as follows:— 545 acres of wheat 6816 bus., oats 100 acres 1970 bus., and barley 45 acres 610 bus. The harvest here is about a week earlier than at Rathwell, and the unbroken land the most heavily covered with oak of any I have seen. In Miami and vicinity recruiting has been as heavy as any place I know of. The local paper a few weeks ago published a list of casualties and o f

Notice to Subscribers In Arrears

Constant increase in the cost of publishing a weekly newspaper has brought the average publisher's profit on subscriptions so close to the vanishing point that it has become more than ever necessary to insist that subscribers, to enjoy the paid-in-advance price of $1.50, pay their subscriptions strictly in advance, otherwise they are carried at a financial loss. A few subscriptions allowed to run in arrears soon amount to many hundreds of dollars and are a very poor asset when it comes to paying cash for printing inks, type, paper and other items as a publisher must do in order to buy right. We are at present engaged in clearing up our subscription books and invite the co-operation of our readers. While we are loath to take any action that would jeopardize the friendly relations between ourselves and even our tardiest subscribers, we must insist that subscribers in arrears pay up without delay. To those who do not respond to this notice, it will be necessary to charge not only the $2 a year rate but also the extra costs of collection, which will at once be added the moment we hand the accounts to our solicitors for collection which we propose to do thirty days after the first publication of this notice.

Walkerton, Sept. 20th, 1917.

Reported Improving

Mrs. John Logie (nee Jessie Guinn) has been very poorly at the County Hospital, following a fall at her home in Paisley a few days ago. Her baby daughter, born on Tuesday night at the Hospital, lived only a few minutes. Mrs. Logie's condition was reported to be improving yesterday.

Hurt in Auto Smash

Walkerton friends will regret to learn that Mrs. Manning, wife of a former principal of the Public School here, was seriously injured in an automobile accident recently, her knee being fractured. At present she is in the hospital at Des Moines, Iowa Mr. Manning, who is now a minister of the Methodist Episcupal Church, is stationed in Iowa about 150 miles from Des Moines.

Coming Home On Leave

Mr. David Robertson K. C. had a cable from his son, Lieut. Had. Robertson, from Liverpool, on Saturday saying that he was coming home on leave. A letter received since from one of his brothers at the Front states that Had. sustained a bad fracture of the collarbone and for that reason he has been given leave. Lieut. Robertson went to England two years ago with the 34th, and is now in the Engineers under his brother, Major Roy Robertson.

Kicked By Horse

Dr. Hall is on crutches this week as the result of a kick from a horse. It happened on Monday night when Robt. Trench brought over his $6,000 racing horse, Paddy R. to have his lame leg examined through Dr. Hall's new X-ray machine which is the only one of the kind in this part of the country The horse was lying strapped on the lawn, and the doctor was standing talking to one of the men when the animal suddenly let drive with his hind foot, the blow catching the doctor's left leg just below the knee with a resounding crack. Had the blow varied by half an inch it would have smashed the doctor's knee. Fortunately it struck the solidest part of the leg and it did not even cause a fracture, although it will deprive him of the use of his limb for a week or more.

Died at Detroit

Walkerton friends were shocked to learn on Sunday of the death the previous day at Detroit of Mrs. Ed. Perrino, formerly Miss Gretchen Roether of this town. Mrs. Perrino was taken ill on the 10th inst. and removed to the Detroit Hospital suffering from peretonitis. On Saturday a telephone message to the friends here announced that her condition was low, and the following day word came that she had passed away on Saturday. Mrs. Perrino was the youngest daughter of the late Samuel Roether of Walkerton and resided here, practising as a trained nurse until her marriage about four months ago. She was a member of Knox Church and one of the most highly esteemed young ladies of the town. Her brothers and sisters who survive are:—Samuel of Toronto; Reuben of Flint, Mich; Miss Susan of Toronto; Mrs. (Dr.) Curtis of Wilmington, Ill; Miss Sarah, and Mrs. C. H. Rogers of Walkerton. The funeral took place at Detroit on Tuesday.

WILL GO AS MISSIONARY

Miss Winifred Warren Designated for the Foreign Field at Knox Church, Walkerton on Tuesday Night

An impressive service was held at Knox Church on Tuesday evening, when Miss Winifred Warren was formally designated for foreign mission service. The affair was unique from the fact that Miss Warren has already been in the Orient as teacher of missionaries' children the past three years and is about to return to take up work with which she is already familiar.

Rev. R. M. Gale, Moderator of Bruce Presbytery, presided and put the usual questions to the candidate. Rev. Dr. R. P. McKay of Toronto gave the dedicatory prayer. Rev. Thos. Wilson addressed the Candidate in the words of Paul to Timothy: "Take heed unto thyself." Mrs. Thos. Wilson, President of the Presbyterial W. M. S. made a short address and presented the bible in behalf of the Wom. Missionary Board. Mrs. Norman Robertson, who was Miss Warren's Sunday School teacher, read an address from the women of Knox Church Auxiliary, Miss Janet Ross presenting her with a purse. A beautiful boquet of flowers was also presented by Ruth Hunter and Margaret Shaw on behalf of the Mission Band. Rev. Dr. Johnston of Montreal replied for his niece, Miss Warren, and her family and also her sainted father, thanking the friends for the words spoken and the kindnesses shown. A very fine address by Rev. Dr. R. P. McKay followed, in which he gave a survey of the whole missionary world.

There was a good attendance, including citizens of all denominations.

Miss Warren expects to sail for China early in October.

Will Attend Normal

Three Walkerton students have enrolled at Stratford Normal College for the coming year: Misses Grace Van Horne, Winnie Wilson and Florence Taylor.

Kunkle—Bauman.

At 9 o'clock Tuesday morning a popular Walkerton young lady, Miss Fortuna Bauman, was united in marriage at the Sacred Heart R. C. Church, Walkerton, to Mr. Stephen Kunkle of Cargill. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Father Hoffarth. The bride was assisted by her friend, Miss Carrie Mosack, and the groom's brother, Mr. Norman Kunkle of Cargill, was best man. Afterwards a sumptuous wedding breakfast was served at the home of the bride's parents on McGovern St. and an enjoyable evening was spent in cards and dancing. Mr. and Mrs. Kunkle left afterwards for their home near Cargill, accompanied by their best wishes of a large circle of friends here.

Art Farrer Wounded

Mr. Sam Farrer received a telegram from Ottawa on Saturday stating that his only son, Signaller Arthur Farrer, had been admitted to No. 22 Casualty Clearing Station in France with a gunshot wound in his right leg. Art was one of the first Walkerton boys to enlist, although scarcely eighteen at the time. He went to England with the 34th Batt'n where he was transferred to the 13th Black Watch, a highlanders battalion from Montreal. He has been fifteen months in the trenches, came through Vimy Ridge without a scratch and is now on the casualty list for the first time. Two or three days before being wounded, he wrote his mother a bright letter telling of the good time he had while off on short leave at Paris.

Soured On Matrimony

If William John Mallard, a prisoner at the County Gaol were a poet, he would write a biting satire on women that would make William Watson's effusion about "the female of the species" read like a eulogy by comparison. Mallard's first wife was a bad egg He put up with her but finally she left him and took up a criminal career, serving several prison terms. After seven or eight years had passed and he had heard nothing from her, he married again. His second venture proved no better. When Wife no. 2 heard he had been married before, she went and had him arrested on a bigamy charge. As soon as Mallard was safely behind the bars and out of the way, she went and married another man. Mallard was tried at Wiarton where the circumstances of the case are well-known. Instead of sending him down for about five years as is customary in bigamy cases, the court gave him 10 days, which is probably heavy enough considering the circumstances. Mallard is said to be an industrious, inoffensive sort of person, with an unfortunate penchant for tying up to the wrong sort of woman.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

RATHER than take its medicine at the polls, the Borden Gov't. is using a club in the form of the War Elections Act to beat up its opponents. The Government may richly deserve a good licking from the electors but going on that good old Prussian principle that Might is Right and nothing else matters the out-going rulers at Ottawa are taking advantage of their position to grab the coming election if possible by brute force. The Premier's friends have decided for him that he must win by hook or by crook, and that nothing short of highway robbery will accomplish it. The solemn covenant made between Canada and the incoming settlers who have thrown in their lot with this country for better or for worse is to be regarded as a "scrap of paper." Is it any wonder that the government's action is being condemned in strong terms by fair-minded people throughout Canaba and is approved nowhere except amongst the narrowest partisans. The War Elections Act may yet prove a boomerang with a kick to it that will prove disastrous to its originators.

THE Canadian Churchman, the official organ of the Anglican Church in Canada, in an editorial in this week's issue entitled, "Is Prohibition a Success?" says:—"Prohibition laws in the six Provinces that have enacted them are working well; but the measure of their success is in exact ratio to the determination of authorities to enforce them. While Provincial prohibition is good, Dominion prohibition would be infinitely preferable. The benefits gained from these laws are almost incalculable and the very thought of going back to the old system is out of the question. In a word, the Church of England in Canada is solid for prohibition. Prohibition removes temptation from the young and stops the casual drinker. To shield young boys by removing the open bar and the saloon from their sight is of inestimable value. Many of us have seen this proved under other temperance legislation and know from actual experience what the removal of the open bar means to a community. A generation hence we will wonder how the bar-room and saloon were ever tolerated.

J. B. Fowler of the London Advertiser writes in that paper:—"Prussianism always overplays its hand. That has been the history of things since creation, and Canada is getting its dose. The C. N. R. purchase, the activities, or rather the inactivities, of Food Controller W. J. Hanna, the closure, the election act, the knighting of every man who has made a few millions, the inequalities of promotion in the militia, the presence of discredited politicians behind Sir Robert Borden, the incapacity of Hon. Tom Crothers, Sir George Foster and others, the failure of the Government to handle profiteers as enemies of the nation, the failure to conscript wealth, Camp Borden, the patronage, these and a score of other things have got the Government "in bad" with the electors. Make no mistake about that. The Liberal party in Western Ontario at least is the liveliest it has been since 1886. There is an overwhelming sentiment behind the party and it is growing, growing by leaps and bounds. It is to be heard everywhere. It is a virile, strong force and will increase in strength."

A SPEAKER at a public meeting here lately expressed the opinion that the falling down in recruiting should be laid at the doors of our individual members of Parliament, both grit and tory. These men at Ottawa, who have been in touch with the real situation had failed to appear on the public platform at home to help in recruiting and to place the seriousness of the situation before their own people. We do not believe the speaker was justified in his conclusions. If the Borden Government had acted with a whole heart and single purpose we believe the 500,000 recruits would have been secured easily. But we do believe there has been too much pussy footing and not enough real leading on the part of our members. In times of national stress an M. P. cuts a better figure on the stump than he does hiding behind the barn. We have a right to look to him for real leadership on big national problems and to expect to find it.

THE national debt has been growing by leaps and bounds and is now said to be approaching 1500 millions. This means that by the end of the war Canada will be mortgaged to the hilt. The Country will also have scores of millionaires who have made prodigious fortunes out of the War. How much fairer it would be to tax the profiteers now and help pay for the War. The working men of Canada are paying a big price in blood and sweat while the wealthy are not doing, and are not even asked to do, their share.

AVAILABLE statistics tend to the conclusion that approximately one-eighth of all patients admitted to public wards in Canadian hospitals are syphilitic. Of these, two-thirds do not know they are suffering from the disease.

Simcoe Reformer: The Canadian Northern purchase was gotten through the House of Commons by the adoption of closure. The Government's resort to this extreme measure leaves some ground for suspicion that there must be a campaign fund steal concealed in it somewhere.

WHEN this bill giving some of the women votes and others no votes comes to be defended on the platform, the Borden orators are going to have some busy nights.

THE excellent harvest should go a considerable way towards assuring a good reception for the new Canadian war loan, expected in November.

IF you can't say a good word about the town you are living in, better move to some other town. A grouch is no asset to any burg.

THOSE Russian war loans were a tempting offer, with a wide margin, but we're glad now we didn't have the money.

THE Borden Election Act stigmatizes all naturalized citizens with the imputation of disloyalty.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson XIII.—Third Quarter, For Sept. 23, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

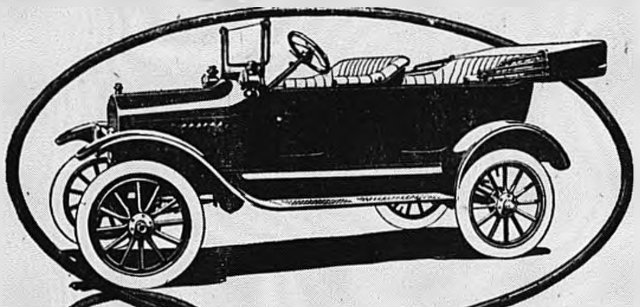
Text of the Lesson, Dan. vi, 10-23. Memory Verses, 22, 23—Golden Text, Ps. xxxiv, 7—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

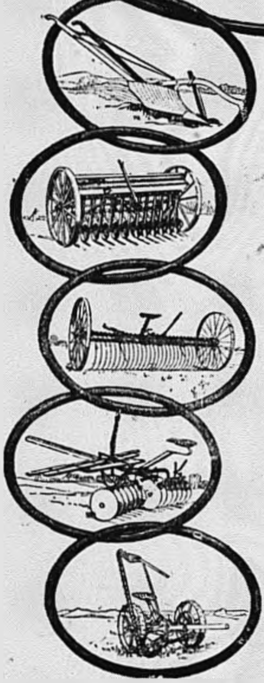
Our last lesson ended with a reference to the epistle of Nebuchadnezzar (chapter iv), in which, after his seven years insanity, he acknowledged the True God and humbled himself before Him. In chapter v we see a proud, rebellious king, who would not humble himself before God, and he had to be taken off the earth. We cannot but think of the sad ending of the rich man of Luke xvi, 23; xii, 20. In this book there is wonderfully shown up the great contrast between the wisdom of this world and the wisdom that comes from God only. In the first and second dreams of Nebuchadnezzar and in the matter of the writing on the wall at Belshazzar's feast all the learning and wisdom of Babylon were utterly helpless to understand or interpret either. But the God of Heaven, the Most High God, whose alone are wisdom and might, who only can reveal secrets and make known what shall come to pass hereafter, He could and did tell Daniel what the king dreamed and the interpretation of it and the significance of the words on the wall.

The learning and scholarship of these days in which we live are just as helpless to interpret the things of God as were the wise men of Babylon, for the things of God knoweth no man, but only the Spirit of God (chapters ii, iv and v and I Cor. ii, 11). There is another matter we should lay to heart in these last days at the end of the time of the gentiles, and that is that "the Lord of hosts hath purposed it, to stain the pride of all glory and to bring into contempt all the honorable of the earth," for "the lofty looks of man shall be humbled and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day" (Isa. xxiii, 9; ii, 11, 17). Those who know only the god of munitions (Dan. xi, 38, margin) shall learn that there is a Living and True God, who needs neither men nor munitions.

The world power having reached its second stage, according to the visions given to Nebuchadnezzar and to Daniel, and the Babylonian having given place to the Medo-Persian, we find Daniel still at the head of affairs, but hated by the other presidents and princes who had to confess that they could find no error nor fault in him and would not be likely to unless in some matter connected with his religion. Knowing that he worshiped and prayed to a God whom they knew not, they approached Darius, the king, with a bit of flattery, asking him to sign a decree that any one asking a petition of any god or man except himself should be cast into the den of lions (verses 4-9). They set the time limit at thirty days, but probably knew that a much shorter time would be sufficient to catch their prey. Darius thoughtlessly fell into the snare and signed the decree. Daniel, knowing all about it, kept right on communing with his God in the usual way and did not think it worth while to close his windows. Of course he was soon caught, for his enemies meant business, and, although the king, when he found how he had been entrapped, labored till the going down of the sun to deliver Daniel, his love was powerless against the law, which had to take its course, and soon Daniel is in the den of lions, and the stone upon the mouth of the den is sealed with the king's own signet. It may have been that Daniel's enemies made merry over their success in getting him out of the way; but, if so, they were an illustration of Job xx, 5. "The triumphing of the wicked is short."

The king, who sought to comfort Daniel with the assurance, "Thy God whom thou servest continually, He will deliver thee" (verse 16), passed a sleepless night, fasting, and very early in the morning was at the den of lions, crying with a lamentable voice, "Oh, Daniel, servant of the Living God, is thy God, whom thou servest continually, able to deliver thee from the lions?" (Verse 20.) What a burden must have rolled from the king's heart when he heard the voice of Daniel assuring him that God had shut the lions' mouths and they had not hurt him! Quickly Daniel is taken from the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, because he believed in his God (verses 22, 23). It was truly a good morning for Daniel, reminding us of the morning that will soon dawn for all the people of God (Ps. xlvi, 5, margin; xlix, 14). It was a terrible time for Daniel's enemies (verse 24), reminding us that there will be no morning for those who do not believe God (Isa. viii, 20, R. V.). He who loved us more than Darius loved Daniel suffered the extreme penalty of the law in our stead, and the stone that covered his tomb was also sealed, but no power of the enemy could hold Him, and now He is alive forevermore, and we are alive in Him if so be we have truly received Him, and there is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. When Daniel's people shall be made all righteous with an everlasting righteousness—at His coming in glory—then shall we come with Him and share with Him and them the everlasting kingdom after the times of the gentiles shall have expired (Dan. ix, 24; vii, 13, 14; Ps. xxii, 27, 28; Col. iii, 4).





Necessary Farm Equipment

MORE and more the Ford car is looked upon by progressive farmers as necessary farm equipment, the same as the plow, the hay-rake, the drill, the mower, the harrow and other labor and time-saving machinery.

A farmer with a Ford car can dispense with one or two of his horses and make the trips to town, railway station, creamery, or to the neighbours in one-third the time. In fact there is no farm machine made that will save the busy farmer and his busy wife so much valuable time as a Ford. And it's so easy to take care of far easier than a horse. No bed to make, or hay and oats to get, no harnessing and unharnessing, and no stables to clean. The Ford practically takes care of itself.

Ask any farmer who owns a Ford if he would ever again try to get along without it. His answer will hasten your decision to own one.

Philharmonic at Teeswater.

The Walkerton Philharmonic Society, about 50 strong under the direction of Mr. Leeson, gave a concert at Teeswater last Thursday night in aid of the Red Cross Society of that village. There was a good sized audience present which proved to be an appreciative one. The musical program was interspersed by recitations by Misses Cunningham, Irwin, and Norrish, all of which made a hit. Solos by Miss Helene Whitehead were encored.

Former Carrick Man Disappears

About six years ago, Barney Weber, son of Mr. Matthew Weber of Formosa went out West. After working in different places for three years he took up a homestead and rented thirty five acres near Carnation, Alta. His father helped him to get started, sending him money to buy horses and seed grain. Barney wrote home regularly, and was on very friendly terms with the folks at home. In the fall of 1915, however, after disposing of his season's crop, letters ceased to come home, and although the friends here have made careful inquiry no trace of him can be obtained. Barney was a careful, industrious man, with no vicious habits, and the family here fear that he has met with foul play. It is earnestly hoped that some trace of the missing man can be found soon.—Mildmay Gazette.

NEWS OF TOWN AND DISTRICT

In the report of the Garden Party at Mr. Thomas Cunningham's, Brant, in last week's Telescope, the names of Miss Florence Cunningham, Mr. E. Ruttle, and the Carrick Orchestra, which took part in the program were inadvertently omitted. The excellent services of those who took part were very much appreciated not only by the audience, but by the ladies who got up the affair.

Has Ford Bought Midland Plant?

The report is in circulation that Henry Ford of Ford car fame has made extensive purchases of property on "Midland Point" to the northwest of the town of Midland. It is said that it is the intention of Mr. Ford to erect a huge plant to manufacture tractors and that his idea in selecting a site in Midland is to be in a position to secure a cheap freight rate to the West on account of the fact that the steamers bringing grain cargoes to the head of the lakes to Midland, Port McNicholl Tiffin, etc., usually return light and particularly advantageous rates could be secured.

The Tara Fire

A disastrous fire in the heart of Tara's business section caused $20,000 damage last Wednesday morning. The fire started in a pool room about 3.30 Morrow's store, Scarrow's furniture store, Walker's harness shop and King's livery were the principal buildings destroyed. The fire insurance totalled about $15,000.

Car Upsets Into Ditch

On Sunday morning a young Carrick farmer came to town to attend church, and upon returning home a number of his town friends offered to accompany him for the sake of the ride. They were proceeding at a happy clip along the blind line just west of the village, when the radius rod on the steering apparatus broke, and the driver lost control of the machine. The auto did a lot of zigzagging on the road and finally plunged into the ditch, where it upset, throwing the occupants out. None of the fellows were badly injured, although one of them had his neck badly twisted when the machine went over. The car was injured to the extent of about fifty dollars.—Mildmay Gazette.

Former Riversdale Resident

Many old friends in this district will learn with regret of the death of an old Riversdale boy, Mr. John McKinnon, a farmer of Portlock Northern Ontario, who passed to the Great Beyond at the Royal Victoria Hospital, Sault Ste Marie, on August 22nd. Deceased was fifty years of age and had been in the North Country 25 years. In the year 1917 he was married to Jean Emslie Gordon, a native of the Walkerton neighborhood. He leaves to mourn his loss a widow and two daughters, Maude and Etta, two sisters, Mrs. Sam McLelland of Gordon Lake and Mrs. Wm. Malone of Toledo, Ohio, and three brothers Hugh, of Gordon Lake, and Alex, and Dan. of Portlock. The funeral took Thursday, Aug. 23rd. to the Gordon Lake cemetery. Rev. Mr. Halliday conducted the service. The funeral sermon was preached in the Portlock Presbyterian Church, on Sunday, Sept. 9th.

POETS' CORNER

CONSERVING MOTHERS

I often hear some long-haired guy
In wild and frenzied anguish cry,
"Conserve the food or else we'll die",
Some way or other—
Come, make each mother strive and try,
It's up to mother.
If there is any work to do,
An egg to fry, a lamb to stew,
A bun to bake, a drink to brew,
Let mother do it.
And if the wash is needing blue—
Let mother blue it.
Let mother wrastle with the tub
Let mother wash and rinse and rub,
Let mother sweep and scald and scrub
With wild elation
Let mother do it—that's the rub—
'Twill save the nation.
O, every day I hear 'em rave;
The vista's dark, the outlook grave,
Expenses we must cut and shave
To save the day sir.
Let mother skimp, conserve and save
In every way, sir.
But I protest against the crew
Why leave it all for her to do?
Conserving is the job for you
And me and others,
I'm going to start conserving too,
Conserving mothers.

They Shall Not Pass

The Immortal Cry of Canada at the Second Battle of Ypres.

The defence of Ypres following the first ghastly gas attack April 22, 1915, exalts all history. By it our men were transfigured and the undying, imperishable Soul of Canada revealed.

In the name of these Heroes of Ypres, Festubert, Givenchy, Vimy Ridge, Lens, The Somme, Verdun—aye and the Deathless "Old Contemptibles"—we beseech you, Women of Canada, to Dedicate Yourselves and Your Families to War Service by signing the Food Service Pledge.

The sacrifice is not great. We merely want you to substitute other foods for part of the white bread, beef and bacon your family now eat.

> "What follows almost defies description. The effect of these poisonous gases was so virulent as to render the whole of the line held by the French Division practically incapable of any action at all.
> The Stand of the Canadians
> "The left flank of the Canadian Division was thus left dangerously exposed to serious attack in flank, and there appeared to be a prospect of their being overwhelmed and of a successful attempt by the Germans to cut off the British troops occupying the salient to the East.
> "In spite of the danger to which they were exposed the Canadians held their ground with a magnificent display of tenacity and courage; and it is not too much to say the bearing and conduct of these splendid troops averted a disaster which might have been attended with the most serious consequences."

Thou Shalt Not Want

The Undying Pledge of Canada's Mothers to Her Sons.

When baking use one-third oatmeal, corn, barley or rye flour. Or, order some brown bread from your baker each day.

Substitute for beef and bacon such equally nutritious foods as fish, peas, lentils, potatoes, nuts, bananas, etc.

Third, and this is most important—positively prevent the waste of a single ounce of food in your home.

A Food Service Pledge and Window Card has been or will be delivered to you. The Pledge is your Dedication to War Service—The Window Card is your Emblem of Honour.

TWO RETURNED HEROES

Given a Public Reception at the Town Hall Thursday Night by Local Preparedness League.

Two returned heroes, Gunner Jim Leech and Pte. Simon Small, were given a public reception at the Town Hall on Thursday night under the auspices of the local Branch of the Bruce Preparedness League.

Mr. John Rowland, who acted as Chairman, gave high praise to the heroes who had been to the Front and had done their bit. He thought that if the politicians at Ottawa who understand the war situation had come out and taken the platform last year at patriotic gatherings and recruiting meetings and explained the situation to the people we would not have the state of affairs that we have to-day. Rev. Thos. Wilson, Sheriff Jermyn of Wiarton (should be of Walkerton," said Mr. Rowland), W. M. Shaw, and Rev. J. W. Sanderson spoke. Rev. R. Perdue presented to each soldier a formal address from the town welcoming him home to Walkerton, also a ten dollar gold piece. Gunner Leech replied in a few appropriate words. He thanked especially the ladies of the Town organizations that have sent those much-appreciated parcels to the boys. Gunner Leech who has the smart soldierly bearing that comes with training has been sixteen years in uniform and is a veteran of the South African War. Pte. Simon Small, replied modestly and briefly and was given a great ovation.

Attractive Voyage in the Channel

To those who have acquaintance with the way of the sea, in different parts of the world, who know something of the strange lonesomeness of mid-Atlantic, the burnished brilliance of the tropics, or the leaden grayness of the Northern oceans, there is something about the English Channel which seems to make it a waterway apart. "Sailing up the Channel," towards the Straits of Dover, or "sailing down the Channel" towards the open sea, are phrases which seem to be abundantly fulfilled in practice, whenever one makes the journey. Every vessel one sees go by has about it an air of setting out or returning home. There is much more of the companionship of the river about it all than of the chance "hail and farewell" of the sea.

Geologists have, of course, much to say about the Channel. They will tell you how, along its coasts on either side, cliffs and lowlands alternate, and how the "geological affinities" between successive opposite stretches are well marked; how the granite of Cornwall and Devon is clearly own brother to the granite of Brittany, and so on, all the way to the "silver streak," where the white cliffs of Dover find fellows in the white limestone about Calais and Boulogne. Geographers, too, will tell you that, if the entrance to the Channel shall be taken to lie between Ushant and the Scilly Isles, its extreme length is about 320 miles; whilst its width varies from 100 miles, at its entrance, to twenty miles at the Straits. The average man pays little attention to the figures, but he is grateful to be incidentally reminded of such places as Devon and Cornwall, of Brittany and Ushant, and the Scilly Isles.

Indeed, among the great joys of a voyage up or down the Channel, to anyone who knows the country well, especially the English shore, are the unexpected views he gains of familiar scenes; the noting how this or that building, hill or wood, which he never thought very conspicuous, stands out quite definitely as a landmark, when observed from the sea. Then, if he makes part of his journey by night, as indeed he needs must, there will be the lights to identify—and who that has made much excursion abroad by sea is not familiar with the satisfaction of greeting a known light a long way off?—Dover, Beachy Head, St. Katherine's Point, and so on.

Perhaps the most thorough way of exploring the Channel is to make the start from London, to pull out from the great mass of warehouses and shipping which piles up in strange complexity round St. Mary Axe, for instance, not far from Wapping Stairs, and be towed cautiously down the river through the Pool and Limehouse Reach, and so on towards the sea. If a start is made at midday in summer, it will be nightfall by the time the ship is off Broadstairs, and the voyager will have an afternoon of recollections of the stately buildings and still more stately trees of Greenwich, the great liners of Tilbury Docks, the "monstrous immensity" of the hotel at Southend, and the familiar landmarks of Whitstable, Herne Bay, and Margate, and so on round the corner to Broadstairs, all places which recent happenings have rendered only too familiar.

After nightfall, if he stays on deck long enough, there is the light on Cape Gris-Nez, over in France, and the lights of Boulogne; and then, as the coast of France falls away south, and the ship hugs the English shore, there are the lights of Hastings and of Eastbourne, and the solitary light at the foot of the cliff at Beachy Head. And, all the time, ships are passing, homeward bound ships mostly, and some, for so it was before the war, are a blaze of light, and some again steal past with nothing showing but just the red and green, on either side, and the steady white light high up on the masthead. Early next morning, maybe, finds the Isle of Wight strangely near on the starboard, and, thereafter, the land sinks away to the most distant horizon, as the coast sweeps inwards along the great bight of Dorset and Devon, and so on to Start Point, and from Start Point to Lizard Head and Land's End. Then as the sun is sinking in the west, lighting up the red cliffs of Cornwall, the Scilly Isles come in sight, and pass by, and the Channel is left behind.—Christian Science Monitor.

A Haunted Bath House.

Ghost stories in Japan develop in warm weather. High temperature has raised a ghost at one of the fashionable baths in Kobe. About the middle of June, a woman died in the establishment. Two days later another woman was taken ill at the same place and died when taken home. She asserted that while at the bath, being all alone, her name was distinctly called. This call was several times repeated. This incident, with usual exaggerations, became known to the patrons of the bath and custom almost ceased. The bathhouse keeper has undertaken to restore the damaged reputation of his establishment by employing a street orator who delivers several lectures daily on the absurdity of the ghost story. Thus far, his attempts to "lay the ghost" have been of no avail. Former customers do not return.—East and West News.

Pure Water.

Pure water, according to Lord Rayleigh, is greenish blue, while pure air is blue, because, according to Newton's dictum, the molecules of the air are sufficiently large to reflect blue rays.

The Overland Big Four—again improved and refined—is the car that built Overland.

This car for nine years has undergone steady development and refinement with the help and advice of an army of owners which now totals over three hundred thousand.

The unprecedented accumulated experience in building this type of car has taught us true balance as nothing else could—the value of right weight—the true tire, gasoline and oil economy—the utmost attainable riding comfort—the lines that truly express refinement and beauty.

The price is $1190 until May 1st—thereafter $1250.

The Light Six is the same model with changes conforming to approved six-cylinder construction and is likewise an excess value car at the price, $1380 until May 1st—thereafter $1435.

These cars represent a safe purchase at a very considerable saving on a basis of comparative values.

Our April deliveries are limited.

HE GOT HIS REWARD

It is not always pleasant, nor profitable, nor even safe to tell "the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth" in a newspaper. Editors who have tried it have generally come to grief. A few weeks ago an editor grew tired of being called a liar, and announced that he would tell the truth. The next issue of his paper said:

John Black, the laziest merchant in town, made a business trip to Belleville yesterday.

William Sykes, our groceryman, is doing a poor business. His store is dirty and dusty. People won't buy in a dirty store.

Rev. Braun preached last Sunday on charity. The sermon was punk. Half of the congregation and four of the choir slept through it all.

David Dawson died at his home this a. m. The doctors say it was heart failure, but we all know how Dave would booze.

The morning after the paper was printed the editor was hanging to a telephone pole.

It was very painful the first few days as I was travelling all the time. I was hit on Wednesday, Aug. 15th. The morning the Canadians started their offensive around Lens. I was north of Lens at Hill 70. Our Casualties were very heavy but nothing to what Fritz's were. The first two lines of trenches were piled full of dead and wounded Boches, as they fought till the last. They won't use their bayonets but they threw bombs and used their rifles till the last. PINKERTON

Mr. Wilmer Donnelly and bride of Wiarton are visiting his parents, Mr. and Mrs. R. Donnelly.

Rev. Mr. Gale attended the Guelph Presbytery at Guelph last week.

Miss Aileen Pinkerton left on Monday to attend the Stratford Normal School. We wish her every success.

Mr. and Mrs. T. Birrell and Mr. Wes. Birrell returned on Saturday from a trip up the St. Lawrence River and the Thousand Islands.

After suffering for some time from a disease which proved fatal, Mr. Thos. Pinkerton passed away on Wednesday morning of last week. The deceased was 43 years old and was a son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Pinkerton. For some years he lived in Toronto but a few months ago he came to the home of his sister, Miss Lena Pinkerton' where he died. Besides his sister and brothers, he leaves to mourn his loss, his wife and three small children, to whom the sympathy of the community is extended. The funeral took place on Thursday and was largely attended.

At the regular Red Cross meeting on Thursday the following articles were shipped.—"Soldiers' Comforts" 84 pair socks, 18 flannel shirts without collars. "Red Cross Supplies" 31 suits pyjamas, 1 bdl. old white linen. The following motion was also passed and carried. Moved by Mrs. Taylor and seconded by Mrs. Mutrie,—that we, the members of the Pinkerton Red Cross Society extend our sincere sympathy to Mrs. McAfee, in the loss of her valiant son, Pte. John McAfee. Though it is some time since Pte. McAfee lived in our vicinity we are proud to claim him as one of the Pinkerton heroes. He has made the Supreme Sacrifice in a noble cause and while we grieve at his untimely death we cannot but be proud of his heroism.

HANOVER

Mrs. Elizabeth Bailey received a telegram from Ottawa notifying her that her son, Pte. Wesley Gordon Bailey, had been wounded on August 13th and is now in the General Hospital at Rouen, France. The telegram stated he was suffering with contusion of the back.

Pte. Geo. D. Lumley, who went overseas with the 147th Grey Battalion, is in the hospital as a result of being gassed. He was formerly teller in the Royal Bank at Hanover. He is a son of Mr. George Lumley, the contractor who is building the Hydro sub-station here.

Mr. William Helwig received a cable from his son, Lieut. Norman Helwig, from London, Eng., which said:—"Wounded in right leg. Doing fine."

An officer writing from the Front in regard to Lieut. Arnold Juckch winning the Military Cross says:—"I have read the official report of the exploit and I can tell you that the decoration was richly deserved. He has done some magnificent work since he came out here."

A very pretty wedding was solemnized at St. Mathew's Lutheran church on Tuesday, Sept. 4th at 3.30 p. m. when Caroline A. eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. Mantu, was united to Otto H. Bluhm, both of Hanover.

Two Italians who had been living and doing business in Hanover under the euphonious name of Providenti left this burg somewhat surreptitiously on Monday of last week—in fact one might say that they took French leave, whatever that means. Anyhow they haven't come back and Hanoverians to whom they forgot to settle before they went—to say nothing of the wholesale fruit merchants—wonder why all this secrecy for the boys seemed to be doing a pretty good business in their fruit store. The sign is up To Let in their late place of business, and if any more olive skinned gents want to rent this store the fee is payable in advance.—Post.

The death occurred at Pilot Mound, Man., recently of Mr. Henry Landerkin, brother of the late senator of Hanover, aged 77 years. Deceased was known to some extent in Hanover. He had amassed considerable wealth. He leaves one daughter to mourn his death.

A rink of Lucknow bowlers were here on Tuesday trying to lift the Keystone Trophy, but a local four consisting of C. Kyle, Jas. Garland, R. Loughleen and R. A. Fowlie skip, managed to beat them out by a wide margin.

William Roumey, who runs a thresh-outfit, met with an unfortunate accident on Monday night. He was standing on the top of the separator making some repairs and put his foot on the wheel that has the knives. The pressure caused the knives to revolve completely severing a portion of the bottom of his foot towards the heel and cutting the cords and muscles. It is hoped that Mr. Roumey will recover the use of his foot but will not be able to take part in any threshing operations during the season that is just opening which is certainly pretty hard luck.

Rev. J. Austin Jackson of Hanover, ex-president of the Hamilton Conference will preach in connection with the Aniversary Services at the Methodist Church next Sunday morning and evening. Mrs. Phillips of Eden Grove will be the soloist.

FROM PRIVATE TO ACTING-MAJOR

ACTING-MAJOR W. B. WATSON, M.C.

In the supplement to the "London Gazette," dated August 16th, containing a list of awards to officers and men for gallantry and devotion to duty in the field, the following appears:

"Sec. Lt. (A. Capt.) Douglas Barker Watson, Midd'x R.—When Acting Adjutant he performed most valuable services to his headquarters, crossing a ridge three times in daylight through heavy machine-gun and rifle fire to obtain exact information as to the situation and dispositions of his battalion. He successfully accomplished his task under very difficult circumstances."

The gallant officer, who is only 21 years of age, was born on the 20th March, 1896, and educated at King Alfred's School, Wantage. He joined the services of the Freight Dept. of the Canadian Pacific Ry., Charing Cross, in December, 1913, and when war broke out he enlisted as a private in the 10th Batt Middlesex Regiment. He was gazetted Sec. Lt. on the 19th Sept. of the same year, was mentioned in despatches amongst others by Gen. A. J. Murray, C. in C., Egyptian Expeditionary Force on the 16th March, promoted to be Acting Captain whilst commanding a company, on April 10th, and in the "Gazette" on May 25th it was stated: "Capt. D. B. Watson, M.C., to be Acting Major, whilst Major on Headquarters of the Battalion."

War Record of C. P. R. Men.

In spite of the fact that day and night the trains and steamers of that great Imperial organization, the Canadian Pacific Railway, have been occupied in the transportation of soldiers and war materials, and that the huge workshops of the company have been turning out vast supplies of munitions of war instead of engines and rolling stock, no fewer than 8,000 men in the service of the company have gone to the front. In every theatre of war they are to be found—in France, Italy, Russia, the Balkans, Mesopotamia, Africa. Of these 8,000 men (apart from 100 who are serving in the Navy) 1,300 have been killed or wounded, among the killed being Capt. the Hon. A. T. Shaughnessy, son of Lord Shaughnessy, president of the C. P. R.

The C. P. R. and Dominion Express staffs in Great Britain before the war numbered 213, of whom 179 were of military age, and of those 179 no fewer than 159 have joined the colors. Among those who have paid the supreme sacrifice have been Lt. A. E. Voysey, Chief Assistant to the European Manager, and Lt. W. B. McArthur, M.C.

The honors won by officials and employees of the company make a long list. Lt.-Col. C. W. P. Ramsay has been made C.M.G. The D.S.O. has been awarded to Lt.-Col. G. S. Cantlie, general superintendent of car service; Lt.-Col. F. A. Gascoigne, superintendent of car service, Montreal; and Maj. J. A. Hesketh, assistant engineer, Winnipeg.

The Military Cross has been gained by Temp. Lt. C. F. Casey (killed), Lt. J. A. Hamilton (killed), Lt. E. Irvine Regt.-Sgt.-Maj. J. Jeffery, Maj. W. M. Kirkpatrick, Lt. W. B. McArthur (killed), Lt. W. H. McMurray, Lt. J. K. Matheson, Co.-Sgt.-Maj. H. Neighbour, Lt. A. M. Robertson, Sgt. Maj. D. Stuart, Capt. L. B. Unwin, Lt. W. B. Watson, and Lt.-Col. F. A. Wilkins

The following have been awarded the D.C.M.: Cpl. A. B. Hancock, Pte. R. Jobling, Pte. R. H. Jones, Sgt. J. R. Langford, Cpl. W. N. Leak, Sgt. D. MacRae, Co.Sgt.-Maj. H. Neighbour, Sec. Cpl. J. F. Newton, Gnr. S. Strickland, Pte. B. A. Stiles.

The Military Medal has been won by Pte. A. Anderson, Sgt. R. J. Campbell, Pte. T. Campbell, Act.-Cpl. D. S. Charleson, Pte. T. C. Christie, Cpl. A. W. Courtney, Gnr. J. R. Coutts, Gnr. S. L. England, Sgt. W. Figsby, Sgt. W. Forsyth, Pte. H. Hamer, Gnr. A. P. Hourd, L.-Cpl. C. M. C. Hoyt, Pte. D. Hutchinson, Pte. M. S. Kennedy, Sgt.-Maj. R. Kennedy, Stf.-Sgt. W. C. Landry, Spr. E. A. McCready, L.-Sgt. C. Moore, Cpl. R. H. Morton, Cpl. R. G. Morrow, Sgt. G. Nuttell, Pte. R. G. Oke, Pte. W. G. Pavey, Sgt. P. T. Roberts, Pte. W. L. Rutledge, Pte. J. Savage, Cpl. S. W. Shackell, Pte. E. Slattery, Sergt.-Maj. D. Stuart, Pte. J. M. Thrasher, Act. Co.-Sgt.-Maj. Westwood, Pte. H. J. Williams, Sgt. R. F. Wilson, L.-Cpl. P. H. Witney, Pte. J. Wright, Sec. Cpl. W. R. Wright, and Sgt. E. Young. Stf.-Sgt. C. A. Hewett has been awarded the Meritorious Medal.

Summarizing, we find the total honors work out as follows: C.M.G., 1; D.S.O., 3; Military Cross, 14; D.C.M., 9; Military Medal, 31; Meritorious Medal, 1. It should also be mentioned that the European manager of the C. P. R., Lt.-Col. G. McLaren Brown, has been appointed an assistant director (unpaid) at the War Office.

GOLD

By
STEWART EDWARD WHITE

to say farewell to us at the edge of town. He gave us a sort of cup made from cocoanut husk, to which long cords had been attached. With these, he explained, we could dip up water without dismounting. We found them most convenient.

Shortly after we had left town and before we had really begun our journey in earnest we passed a most astonishing caravan going the other way. This consisted of sixteen mules and donkeys under sole charge of three men armed with antiquated and somewhat rusty muskets. On either side of each mule, slung in a rope and plain to see, hung a heavy ingot of gold! Fascinated, we approached and stroked the satiny beautiful metal and wondered that on a road so crowded with travelers of all grades so precious a train should be freely intrusted to the three ragged, lazy natives. So curious did this seem that Talbot inquired of the leader why it was allowed.

"Whither would a thief run to? How could he carry away these heavy ingots?" the man propounded.

Often around subsequent campfires we have in idle curiosity attempted to answer these two questions successfully, but have always failed. The gold was safe.

We arrived in Panama in the afternoon, and we were all eyes, for here was a city taken directly from the pages of the "Boy's Own Pirate." Without the least effort of the imagination we could see Morgan or Kidd or some other old swashbuckler, cutlass in teeth, pistols in hand, broad sashed, fierce and ruthless, rushing over the walls or through the streets, while the cathedral bells clanged wildly and women screamed. Everything about it was of the past, for somehow the modern signs of American invasion seemed temporary and to be blown away. The two story wooden houses with corridor and veranda across the face of the second story, painted in bright colors, leaned crazily out across the streets toward each other. Narrow and mysterious alleys led up between them. Ancient cathedrals and churches stood gray with age before grass grown plazas. And in the outskirts of town were massive masonry ruins of great buildings, convent and colleges, some of which had never been finished.

We stopped over one day at the Fonda Americano and then, realizing that we were probably in for a long wait, found two rooms in a house off the main street. These we rented from a native at a fairly reasonable rate. They were in the second story of a massive stone ruin whose walls had been patched up with whitewash. Outside the walls of the city was a large encampment of tents in which dwelt the more impecunious or more economical of the miners. Here too had located a large hospital tent. There was a great deal of sickness, due to the hardships of the journey, the bad climate, irregular living, the overeating of fruit, drinking, the total lack of sanitation. In fact, only the situation of the city—out on an isthmus in the sea breezes—I am convinced, saved us from pestilence. Every American seemed to possess a patent medicine of some sort, with which he dosed himself religiously in and out of season. A good many, I should think, must have fallen victims to these nostrums.

Each morning regularly we went down to harass the steamship employees. Roughly speaking, some 300 of us had bought through passage before leaving New York, and it was announced that only fifty-two additional to those already aboard could be squeezed into the first steamer. The other 248 would have to await the next. Naturally every man was determined that he would not be left, for such a delay in such a place at the time of a gold rush was unthinkable. The officials at that steamship office had no easy time. Each man wanted first of all to know just when the ship was to be expected, a thing no one could guess. Then he demanded his accommodations and had a dozen reasons why his claim should be preferred over that of the others. I never saw a more quarrelsome, noisy dog kennel than that steamship office. Why no one was ever shot there I could not tell you.

In the evening the main street was a blaze of light, and the byways were cast in darkness. The crowd was all afoot and moved restlessly to and fro from one bar or gambling place to another. Of the thousands or so of strangers we came in time to recognize by sight a great many. The journey home through the dark wall portions. We never attempted it except in company, and, as Johnny seemed fascinated with a certain game called Mexican monte, we often had to endure long waits before all our party was assembled.

One morning our daily trip to the steamship office bore fruit. We found the plaza filled with excited men, all talking and gesticulating. The much tired officials had evolved a scheme for deciding which fifty-two of the 300 should go by the first ship.

By next morning the transportation officials had worked it out. We could not all get into the office, so the drawing took place on the plaza outside. As each man's name was called he stepped forward, showed his ticket and was allowed to draw a slip from a box. If it proved to be a blank he went away; if he was lucky, he had his ticket vised on the spot. Such a proceeding took the greater part of the day, but the excitement remained intense. No one thought of leaving even for the noon meal.

Yank drew passage on the first steamer. Talbot, Johnny and I drew blanks.

We walked down to the shore to talk over the situation.

"We ought to have bought tickets good on this particular ship, not merely good on this line," said Johnny.

"Doesn't matter what we ought to have done," rejoined Talbot a little impatiently. "What are we going to do? Are we going to wait here until the next steamer comes along?"

"That's likely to be two or three months—nobody knows," said Johnny.

"No; it's in six weeks, I believe. They tell me they've started regular trips on a new mail contract."

"Well, six weeks. If we stay in this hole we'll all be sick, we'll be broke, and in the meantime every ounce of gold in the country will have been picked up."

"What's the alternative?" I asked.

"Sailing vessel," said Talbot briefly.

"That's mighty uncertain," I objected. "Nobody knows when one will get in, and when it does show up it'll be a mad scramble to get to her. There's a mob waiting to go."

"Well, it's one or the other. We can't walk, and I don't see that the situation is going to be much better when the next steamer does get here. There are a couple of hundred to crowd in on her, just counting those who are here and have tickets. And then there will be a lot more."

"I'm for the sailing vessel," said Johnny. "They come in every week or two now, and if we can't make the first one we'll have a good chance at the second or the third."

Talbot looked at me inquiringly.

"Sounds reasonable," I admitted.

"Then we've no time to lose," said Talbot decisively and turned away toward the town.

Yank, who had listened silently to our brief discussion, shifted his ride to his shoulder and followed. Shortly he fell behind, and we lost him.

CHAPTER VI.

Off For the North.

WE accompanied Talbot in some bewilderment, for there was no ship in sight nor in prospect, and we could not understand any reason for this haste. Talbot led the way directly to the steamship office.

"I want to see Brown," he asserted, naming the chief agent for the company.

The clerk hesitated. Brown was an important man and not to be disturbed for trivial matters. But Talbot's eye could be very assured.

"What is your business with Mr. Brown?" asked the clerk.

"It is with Mr. Brown," said Talbot firmly, "and I may add that it is to Mr. Brown's own interest to see me. Tell him just that and that Mr. Talbot Ward of New York city desires an immediate interview."

The clerk was gone for some moments, to the manifest annoyance of a dozen miners who wanted his attention. When he returned he motioned us to a screened off private office in the rear.

"Mr. Brown will see you," said he.

We found Brown to be a florid, solidly built man of fifty, with a keen eye and a brown beard. He nodded to us briefly and looked expectant.

"We three men," said Talbot directly, "hold three tickets on your line. We were not fortunate enough to get passage on the next steamer, and our business will not permit us to wait until the one after. We want our money back."

Brown's face darkened.

"That is a matter for my clerks, not for me," he said curtly. "I was told your business was to my advantage. I have nothing to do with tickets."

"One minute," said Talbot. "There are between two and three hundred men in this town each of whom bought a ticket from your company in New York in the expectation, if not the understanding, that they were to get through passage immediately."

"No such thing was expected or guaranteed," interposed Brown abruptly.

"Not guaranteed nor expected by you—by us, yes."

"I cannot argue that matter. I have no further time for you. Good day." And Brown once more reached his hand toward his bell.

"Suppose," said Talbot softly, leaning forward, "I should put it into the heads of those 300 men that they ought to get their passage money back?"

Brown's hand stopped in midair.

"They are large, violent, armed men, and they are far from pure home influences," went on Talbot mockingly. "Here's a sample of them," said he indicating my huge frame. "And there are a thousand or so more not directly interested, but dying for excitement."

"Are you trying to intimidate me, sir?" demanded Brown.

"I am just stating conditions."

"You are threatening me."

"Ah, that is different," said Talbot Ward.

Brown sat lost in thought for some moments. Then he reached forward and at last struck the bell.

"Let me have your tickets," he commanded us shortly.

He indorsed them and handed them to the clerk, together with a written order. We all sat in absolute silence for perhaps five minutes. Then the clerk returned with a handful of gold. This Brown counted over and shoved across to Talbot. The latter also counted it and thrust it in his pocket.

"Now," said Brown, with something approaching geniality, "I am counting on your honor to say nothing of this outside. I am gambling on your evident class in life at home."

"You have our promise, and it will be kept," said Talbot.

At our place we found that Yank had not returned. At first we thought nothing of this, but about dusk we found that all his belongings had disappeared.

We could not understand this sudden departure, except on the possible ground that Yank, realizing that now the party must split forces, had decided to seek new companions among those lucky enough to sail on the first steamer.

"Even then he needn't have been in such a hurry," complained Johnny a trifle bitterly. "And he needn't have thought we'd be in his way."

"Has he paid his share of the lodgings?" it occurred to me to ask.

We felt quite bitter against Yank, and we carefully avoided his usual haunts, for we did not want to meet him. Then we began to think it strange we had not run across him somewhere on the streets. Then we began to look for him. We found that Yank had disappeared!

At that, a little alarmed, we set ourselves to a serious search and inquiry. A few remembered to have seen him, but were vague as to when and where. The authorities moved sluggishly, and with little enthusiasm. Men were dying every day and disappearing underground, leaving no trace of themselves behind. One more or less seemed unimportant.

In the meanwhile we spent much of our time by the shore, together with a comfortable majority of our fellow argonauts, awaiting the sighting of a vessel. We had engaged and paid daily a boatman to be in readiness to take us off, and we settled our lodgings account a week ahead.

"There's going to be a scramble for that blessed ship," said Talbot, "and we'll just be prepared."

To that end we also kept our effects packed and ready for instant removal.

The expected ship came, of course, on one of these dull gray days, and those who had thought themselves unlucky in being crowded out of the bots were the first to sight her. They sneaked down very quietly and tried to launch two of the boats. Of course the native boatmen were all inside; trust them! As a high surf was running, and as none of the men were in any sense good boatmen, they promptly broached to and filled. The noise brought us to the door.

Then there was a fine row. One of the two boats commandeered by the early birds happened to be ours. All our forethought seemed to have been in vain. The bedraggled and crestfallen men were just wading ashore when we descended upon them. Talbot was like a raving lunatic.

"You hounds!" he roared. "Don't you dare try to sneak off! You catch hold here and help empty these boats! You would, would you?" He caught one escaping worthy by the collar and jerked him so rapidly backward that his heels fairly cracked together. Johnny flew to the combat with a chuckle of joy. I contented myself by knocking two of them together until they promised to be good. The four we had collared were very meek. We all waded into the wash where the boat lay sluggishly rolling. It is no easy matter to empty a boat in that condition. Water weighs a great deal; is fearfully inert, or at least feels so, and has a bad habit of promptly slopping in again. We tugged and heaved and rolled and hauled until our joints cracked, but at last we got her free.

In the meantime forty other boats had been launched and were flying over the waves halfway between the shore and the ship.

Talbot was swearing steadily and with accuracy. Johnny was working like a crazy man. I was heaving away at the stern and keeping an eye on our involuntary helpers. The boatman, beside himself with frantic excitement, jabbered and ran about and screamed directions that no one understood. About all we were accomplishing now was the keeping of that boat's head straight against the heavy wash.

It seemed as though we tugged thus at cross purposes for an hour. In reality it was probably not over two or three minutes. Then Talbot regained sufficient control to listen to the boatman. At once he calmed down.

"Here, boys," said he, "ease her backward. You, Johnny, stand by at the bow and hold her head on. Frank and I will give her a shove at the stern. When the time comes I'll yell, and you pile right in, Johnny. Vamos, Manuel!"

We took our places, the boatman at the oars, his eyes over his shoulder watching keenly the in racing seas.

The four dripping culprits looked at each other uncertainly, and one of them started to climb in the boat.

"Well, for God's sake!" screeched Talbot and made a headlong bull rush for the man.

The latter tumbled right out of the boat on his back in the shallow water. His three companions fled incontinently up the beach, where he followed them as soon as he could scramble to his feet.

Manuel said something sharply, without looking around.

"Shove!" screeched Talbot. "Pile in, Johnny!"

We bent our backs. The boat resisted, yielded, gathered headway. It seemed to be slipping away from me down a steep hill.

"Jump in!" yelled Talbot.

I gave a mighty heave and fell over the stern into the bottom of the boat. Waters seemed to be crashing by, but by the time I had gathered myself together and risen to my knees we were outside the line of breakers and dancing like a gull over the smooth broad surges.

Ships could anchor no nearer than about a mile and a half offshore. By the time we had reached the craft she was surrounded by little boats bobbing and rubbing against her sides. She proved to be one of that very tubby, bluff bowed type then so commonly in use as whalers and freighters. The decks swarmed black with an excited crowd.

We rowed slowly around her. We were wet and beginning to chill. No way seemed to offer by which we could reach her decks save by difficult clambering, for the gang ladder was surrounded ten deep by empty boats. A profound discouragement succeeded the excitement under which we had made our effort.

No Way Seemed to Offer by Which We Could Reach Her Decks.

"The deuce with her!" snarled Johnny. "There's no sense going aboard her. There's enough on deck now to fill her three times over. Let's get back where it's warm."

"If I run across any of those fellows in town I'll break their necks!" said I.

"What makes me mad"— continued Johnny.

"Oh, for heaven's sake shut up!" cried Talbot.

If he had been a little less cold and miserable we probably would have quarreled. As it was, we merely humped over and motioned the astonished Manuel to return to the shore. Our boat's head turned, we dropped down under the bow of the ship. In order to avoid the sweep of the seas Manuel held us as closely as possible under the bowsprit. We heard a hail above us. Looking up we saw Yank bending over the rail.

We stared at him, our mouths open, so astonished that for a moment we did not even think to check the boat. Then we came back in a clumsy circle. Yank yelled at us, and we yelled back at him, but so great was the crash of waters and the whistling of wind that we could make out nothing. Then Yank, motioning us to remain where we were, disappeared, to return after a short interval with a speaking trumpet.

"Have you got your baggage with you?" he roared.

We shook our heads and waved our arms.

"Go get it!" he ordered.

We screamed something back at him.

"Go get it!" he repeated and withdrew his head entirely.

We rowed back to town. It was no longer necessary to return to the exposed beach where we had waited to sight the ships. Johnny and I indulged in much excited speculation, but Talbot refused to show curiosity.

"He's there, and he's evidently engaged us passage, and he wants us aboard to claim it," said he, "and that's all we can know now, and that's enough for me."

Yank met us at the top of the gangway and assisted us in getting our baggage aboard. Johnny and I peppered him with questions, to which he vouchsafed no answer. When we had paid off the boatman he led the way down a hatch into a very dark hole near the bows. A dim lantern swayed to and fro. Through the murk we could make out a dozen bunks.

"They call this the fo'cas'le," said Yank placidly. "Crew sleeps here. This is our happy home. Everything else full up. We four," said he, with a little flash of triumph, "are just about the only galoots of the whole b'iling at Panama that gets passage. She's loaded to the muzzle with men that's come away around the Horn in her, and the only reason she stopped in here at all is to get a new thingum-a-jig of some sort that she had lost or busted or something."

"Well, I don't like my happy home while she wabbles so," said Johnny. "I'm going to be seasick, as usual. But for heaven's sake, Yank, tell us where you came from and all about it. And make it brief, for I'm going to be seasick pretty soon."

He lay down in one of the bunks and closed his eyes.

"You'd much better come up on deck into the fresh air," said Talbot.

"Fire ahead, Yank, please!" begged Johnny.

"Well," said Yank, "when I drew that steamer ticket it struck me that somebody might want it a lot more than I did, especially as you fellows drew blanks. So I hunted up a man who was in a hurry and sold it to him for $500. Then I hired one of these sail rigged fishing boats and laid in grub for a week and went cruising out to sea five or six miles."

Johnny opened one eye.

"Why?" he demanded feebly.

"I was figgering on meeting any old ship that came along a little before the crowd got at her," said Yank. "And judging by the gang's remarks that just left, I should think I'd figgered just right."

"You bet you did," put in Talbot emphatically.

"It must have been mighty uncomfortable cruising out there in that little boat so long," said I. "I wonder the men would stick."

"I paid them and they had to," said Yank grimly.

"Why didn't you let us in on it?" I asked.

"What for? It was only a one man job. So then I struck this ship and got aboard her after a little trouble persuading her to stop. There wasn't no way of making that captain believe we'd sleep anywhere we could except cash, so I had to pay him a good deal."

"How much?" demanded Talbot.

"It came to two hundred apiece. I'm sorry."

"Glory be!" shouted Talbot. "We're ahead of the game. Yank, you long headed old pirate, let me shake you by the hand!"

"I wish you fellows would go away," begged Johnny.

Thus at last we escaped from the isthmus. At the end of twenty-four hours we had left the island of Tobago astern and were reaching to the north.

CHAPTER VII.

The Golden City.

WE stood in between the hills that guarded the bay of San Francisco about 10 o'clock of an early spring day. A fresh cold wind pursued us, and the sky above us was bluer than I had ever seen it before, even on the isthmus. To our right some great rocks were covered with seals and sea lions, and back of them were hills of yellow sand. A beautiful great mountain rose green to our left, and the water beneath us swirled and eddied in numerous whirlpools made by the tide.

Everybody was on deck and close to the rail. We strained our eyes ahead and saw two islands and beyond a shore of green hills. None of us knew where San Francisco was located, nor could we find out. The ship's company were much too busy to pay attention to our questions. The great opening out of the bay beyond the long narrows was therefore a surprise to us. It seemed as vast as an inland sea. We hauled to the wind, turning sharp to the south, glided past the bold point of rocks.

Then we saw the city concealed in a bend of the cove. It was mainly of canvas, hundreds, perhaps thousands of tents and canvas houses scattered about the sides of hills. The flat was covered with them, too, and they extended for some distance along the shore of the cove. A great dust borne by the wind that had brought us in swept across the city like a cloud of smoke. Hundreds and hundreds of vessels lay at anchor in the harbor, a vast fleet.

We were immediately surrounded by small boats and our decks filled with men. We had our first sight of the genuine miners. They proved to be as various as the points of the compass. Big men, little men, clean men, dirty men, shaggy men, shaven men, but all instinct with an eager life and energy I have never seen equaled.

They addressed us eagerly, asking a thousand questions concerning the news of the outside world. We could hardly answer them in our desire to question in return. Were the gold stories really true? Were the diggings very far away? Were the diggings holding out? What were the chances for newcomers? And so on without end, and the burden always of gold, gold, gold!

We were answered with the enthusiasm of an old timer welcoming a newcomer to any country. Gold, plenty of it. They told us in breathless snatches the most marvelous tales. One sailor had dug $17,000 in a week. Another man, a farmer from New England, was taking out $3,000 to $8,000 daily. They mentioned names and places. They pointed to the harbor full of shipping. "Four hundred ships," said they, "and hardly a dozen men aboard the lot! All gone to the mines!" And one man, snatching a long narrow buckskin bag from his pocket, shook out of its mouth to the palm of his hand a tiny cascade of glittering yellow particles—the dust! We shoved and pushed, crowding around him to see this marvelous sight. He laughed in a sort of excited triumph and tossed the stuff into the air.

"Plenty more where they came from!" cried the man.

Gets Damage From Township

C. J. Henry, an Elderslie farmer, sued the Township for $60 damages at Division Court, Tara, last week before Judge Greig. The township had been getting gravel from the pit on Henry's farm and last July when the ground was very wet sent teams to the pit to draw gravel. The main road on the farm leading to the pit was in bad condition and the teams deviated from the road and made several new tracks which Henry claimed damaged the grass. Henry pastured cattle on this farm and was at the expense of keeping a man at the gate while the teams were drawing the gravel and he also claimed allowance for this work. Several witnesses were called and swore that the ground was badly cut up. The Judge gave judgement in favor of Henry for $17 10 and this included the cost of the gravel taken by the township, the township to pay all costs of the Court.

An Old Brant Resident

Mrs. Catherine Kerry beloved wife of Wm Kerry sr., Eden Grove, passed away quite suddenly from heart failure on Sept 12th aged 73 years, 3 months and 9 days. Mrs. Kerry had not been feeling very well but was sitting up talking with members of her family a few minutes before the last summons came. Mrs. Kerry, whose maiden name was Catherine McDonald, was born in Halton County, coming to Brant with her parents over sixty years ago. Five years later she was married to Mr. Kerry, and spent her life-time on the farm, lot 8, con. 11, Brant where she passed away. Mrs. Kerry was a woman of fine qualities of heart and mind, highly esteemed by all who knew her. Besides her husband, she is mourned by five sons, William, John, George, Harvey and Robert, all of Brant, and three daughters, Mrs. Wm. Fennell of Walkerton, Mrs. Robt. McKeen of Arran, and Mrs. Edward McGaffin of Sonningdale, Sask. The funeral took place to Douglas Hill Cemetary on Friday afternoon, Rev. Mr. Storey, pastor of Eden Grove Methodist Church officiating. A large concourse of old friends and neighbors followed the remains to their last resting place.

Plucky Young Soldier.

Corp. Garrett Daunt O'Connor, a nephew of Mr. John Lamb of Brant who has visited here as a boy, is in a hospital in France suffering from a gun-shot wound in the knee. Corp. O'Connor enlisted with 50 of the Science Class at Queen's University, in the Canadian Engineers at the beginning of the war. Corp. O'Connor continued to "carry on" the past three years though he was wounded in the arm, torn by shrapnel, buried in a mine, stunned by a shell etc. For his good work, Corp. O'Connor has been recommended for a commission in the Flying Corps.

Will They All Be Fined?

Last week a detective motored through this part of the country seeking whom he might find violating any of the various new regulations which have recently been placed on the statutes of this province but which many appear to have considered not worth paying any particular attention to—such as the pure food and seed regulations, and that latest one prohibiting the sale of canned goods. Figuratively speaking, this scout got a tuft of hair out of nearly every merchant's wool, and in many cases carried away the whole scalp. Grocers willingly and innocently sold him health salts, for instance without putting a war tax stamp on, and a druggist handed out something else minus the stamp. Others were found with adulterated spices, &c, or had sold tins of peas, corn or tomatoes, while dealers in tobacco had thoughtlessly taken squares of plugs out of the caddies instead of leaving them in until sold, or had a different brand of cigars in a box than the name called for. Passing a farm within a few miles of town the keen eye of the sleuth noted a field where beanstalks were growing at such a distance apart that it would be impossible for them to have even a nodding acquaintance with each other on a windy day. The farmer is interviewed "Where did you get the beans?" and so on. A sample is asked for from the seller in town, and the beans for seed purposes will be tested by an expert. This gentleman overlooked no one who should be called upon, and the fellows on whom he found the goods are wondering how much it's going to cost them after his report is made to headquarters. In Paisley there are a few whose names are not entered in his book, but in some of the neighboring towns every man Jack had been treating one or other of the regulations as a joke, and now they are in torture. We are told that there are one hundred of these detectives out through the province, and if each one of the centurians finds as many offenders as he who did duty in this territory, and each offender is fined according to law, the provincial treasury will be filled to overflowing. Next thing we may find calling upon us is a fellow who will examine our teeth on meatless days for traces of pork or beef!—Paisley Advocate.

PINKERTON FALL FAIR

Drew Delightful Weather this Year and Larger Crowd than Last Year—Hall Exhibits were Good.

"Always fine weather on Pinkerton Show day," has come to be a proverb around here. This year the Weather man did particularly well for the Pinkerton folks, with the result that the attendance exceeded last year by a good margin. With so many boys of the neighborhood off to the Front, others out West on the Harvest excursions, and the majority of the farmers short of help it is a wonder there is anybody left on the farm to get the prize heifer ready to show, but nevertheless the exhibits were there in fair quantity. Some classes were light but for quality the entries, particularly in the root, vegetable and grain classes, reflected the magnificence of the crops in Bruce this year. The three prize turnips for instance weighed about 50 lbs. The show in the Hall was pretty good throughout. Field entries were excellent, ladies work particularly good. In the stock ring the showing of cattle was good, and sheep were fair. Only a few horses were shown but of pretty good quality. Needless to say, the school children were all there, eager for "the races." In the interest they took in this feature, the big folks ran the kids a close second Inspector John McCool acted as judge, and Amsey Graig was starter. The prize winners were:—Boys' race under 14 years: . Tom Powers, 2. Willie Warren, 3. rthur Donnelly. Boys' under 10 years; Ray Taylor, 2. John Powers, 3. Pear- n Elder. Boys' under 8 years: 1. M. hite, 2. Wesley Reaburn, 3. Mike wers. Boys' race, any age: 1. Dan idy, 2. Alf. Fiddis, 3. John Des- d. Girls, race under 10 years: leen Lambertus 2. Matilda Schar- h, 3. Nellie Hetaler. Girls' race der 8: 1. Grace Kyle, 2. Stella Don- elly, 3. Mary Clancy. Girls' race, any age: 1. Vera Lambertus, 2. Aggie Anstett, 3. Margery Copper.

Notice to Subscribers In Arrears

Constant increase in the cost of publishing a weekly newspaper has brought the average publisher's profit on subscriptions so close to the vanishing point that it has become more than ever necessary to insist that subscribers, to enjoy the paid-in-advance price of $1.50, pay their subscriptions strictly in advance, otherwise they are carried at a financial loss. A few subscriptions allowed to run in arrears soon amount to many hundreds of dollars and are a very poor asset when it comes to paying cash for printing inks, type, paper and other items as a publisher must do in order to buy right. We are at present engaged in clearing up our subscription books and invite the co-operation of our readers. While we are loath to take any action that would jeopardize the friendly relations between ourselves and even our tardiest subscribers, we must insist that subscribers in arrears pay up without delay. To those who do not respond to this notice, it will be necessary to charge not only the $2 a year rate but also the extra costs of collection, which will at once be added the moment we hand the accounts to our solicitors for collection which we propose to do thirty days after the first publication of this notice.

BROTHERS MET IN LONDON

Ed. Eidt Visits Boys of Wittley Camp and Has a Good Word for the Bruce Battalion.

Two Walkerton brothers, Corp. Ed. Eidt D. C. M. and Sergt. Walt. Eidt of the 160th Batt'n had the good fortune to meet and spend several days together in England lately, while Ed. was on ten days' leave from the trenches. As it was nearly two years since the brothers had met, two years during which much had happened, their meeting was a joyful occasion. Ed has been on the Somme, Vimy Ridge, Hill 70, and at Lens, which means all the biggest battles of the last year, incidently winning the Distinguished Conduct Medal for gallantry in battle. Writing home, Walt. says that Ed. "looks fine and dandy. He is not as stout as he was when he left home but he looks better and healthier."

Ed. writes: "I landed in London from Boulogne on the night of the 1st of September and stayed at the Maple Leaf Club, and the next day went up to Wittley Camp. I stayed there two or three days and had a fine time with all the boys, and there are certainly quite a number of them at Wittley. They (the 160th) went out on a three days' practice manoeuvre, and I saw them all march off, our old Colonel (Sutherland) in the lead. They are a very good looking battalion and I think will make a name for themselves in France. The boys are all tired of the monotony of training camps and are anxious to come across the Channel and expect to be sent over as a battalion. I came up to London the day they left and went around by Epsom Hospital where I saw Wilfred McKay who was wounded in June. He is looking fine but still has a limp, and I expect it will be a long time yet before he is fit to return to France. Had quite a time with him and went up to his Ward with him for a while. I am getting a little deaf. It's more noticeable here in England, especially in any quiet place."

On his return journey to the lines, Corp. Eidt, met three other Walkerton boys, Bert Cartwright, Walter Bryce and Levi Miller and spent a few hours with them.

TAUGHT HERE 30 YEARS

Miss Annie Robertson, whose Death Occurred at Southampton on Saturday is Remembered by Every School Boy and Girl of Last Generation

Hundreds of Walkerton boys and girls, now grown to maturity and scattered throughout the length of Canada will recall with affectionate remembrance their old teacher, Miss Annie Robertson, and will learn with regret of her death which occurred at her home at Southampton on Saturday. Miss Robertson faithfully taught the young idea how to shoot, in Walkerton Public School year after year for upwards of a generation. She was a woman of fine personality and her lifework will long endure. Last winter she underwent a serious operation at the Bruce County Hospital. While it gave her temporary relief and she was able for a time to return to her home, her condition became gradually worse. The months spent in the hospital here were brightened by visits and little kindnesses from many of her old friends here, which she appreciated very much. Miss Robertson's parents, who were residents of Southampton, have been dead for a number of years, but she has several sisters and one brother still living. The funeral took place at Southampton on Monday.

Those Who Vote in Next Election

Those who will be allowed to vote at the next federal election in Canada, according to the War Elections Act and the soldier's vote bill which was passed recently are: All civilian citizen males over 21, except conscientious objectors to military services, those of alien enemy origin who have become naturalized citizens within fifteen years, and those of alien enemy mother tongue, although born in other countries and naturalized less than fifteen years ago. All soldiers in the Canadian forces. All Canadian soldiers in the Imperial forces. Wives, widows, mothers and sisters over 21, of soldiers in the overseas forces. All nurses and other women officially connected with the overseas forces.

Eleven Years Old: "Doing His Bit" At Home.

This plucky young lad, Wallace Wilton, is only eleven years old but he took the place of a hired man on his father's farm this summer. He cut practically the whole crop on 150 acres, handling three horses on the binder in good style. Wallace is the only son of Mr. and Mrs. John Wilton of Carrick. The picture is from a snapshot taken at Mildmay Fair last week in his khaki suit.

Red Cross Work

The Women of Riversdale and vicinity have in the past fourteen months sent in over two hundred pairs of socks, also large quantities of hospital supplies such as shirts, pillows, towels, blankets, pyjamas, night shirts, quilts and pillow-cases. The work is looked after by Mrs. Wm. McDonald of Riversdale and shipped to the Red Cross Society through Mrs. Ramsey of Walkerton.

Fatal Auto Accident

A young man named McVity, a clerk in the Merchants Bank, Southampton, was instantly killed in an auto accident between Port Elgin and Southampton at midnight on Tuesday. McVity and some friends were driving a car and in passing another auto at a narrow place in the road, went too close to the ditch. Their car turned turtle and McVity was completely decapitated by the windshield.

Wedded At London

Mr. Robert L. Gibson surprised his friends last Wednesday by taking a trip to London and bringing back a charming young bride in the person of Miss Linnie McNeill of Chicago. The marriage ceremony was performed by Rev. D. C. McGregor M. A. pastor of Knox Church, London. The bride is a daughter of Mr. Thomas McNeill formerly of Walkerton, and has visited relatives in Brant on more than one occasion. Mr. and Mrs. Gibson have the best wishes of the people of Walkerton for long life and happiness.

Council Should Get Busy

We understand that the fish from Lake Nipigon which the Ontario Government proposes to supply to dealers at 10cts. a lb. to sell to the public at 12½cts., has to be ordered by municipalities from the government, and that one or two town councils have already placed their orders. If that is the case, Mayor Johnston and the Town Council have an excellent opportunity to help the people of this town by getting in touch with the Department and arranging with the local butchers and fish dealers to handle the supply. Fish at 12½cts. would mean a big thing for the wage earners of Walkerton.

Orazsek—Mosack

At Sacred Heart R. C. Church on Thursday, September 20th at 9 a. m. Miss Cecelia Mosack, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Mosack of Walkerton, and Mr. David Orazsek of Kitchener were married by Rev. Father Hoffarth. The bride who was supported by her sister, Miss Carrie Mosack was prettily gowned in delf blue silk crepe, wearing a white hat trimmed with pearls and carrying a boquet of white bridal roses and maiden-hair ferns. The bridesmaid wore a beautiful dress of blue silk crepe, hat of the same shade and carried a boquet of pink roses and maiden-hair ferns. The groom was assisted by his brother, Mr. Sam Orazsek of Kitchener. Afterwards about twenty-five guests, including the immediate relatives, sat down to a sumptuous repast at the home of the bride's parents. During the evening a large company of young people paid their respects to the happy couple and spent an enjoyable evening in dancing and cards. Among those present from a distance were:—Mrs. Wm. Zinger, and Mr. Rickerman of Kitchener, and Mr. Ed. and Miss Olive Mosack of Preston. Mr. and Mrs. Orazsek left on Saturday for their new home at Kitchener.

VOLUME XLXI NUMBER XXXVIII
WALKERTON, SEPTEMBER 27th, '17

EDITORIAL COMMENT

THE disfranchisement of naturalized aliens is a breach of faith for which there is no justification, says the Farmers' Weekly Sun. Their number is too small to influence, in any event, the election or, in Mr. Meighen's high-sounding phrase, the destiny of our country. Our conclusion is that these men are deprived of the right to vote as a foil for the real enterprise, which is to multiply the soldier vote by enfranchising the soldiers' women. It is a clumsy and unscrupulous venture in soldier politics, which, if respect for democracy is not a mere affectation, ought to stir every citizen to just indignation. The expression of public opinion having been suppressed, we are unable to estimate the effect of the Act on the people. From Canadian history we learn that the bitterest controversies have been about Parliamentary representation, all the way back from the Act of 1865 through the representation by population agitations, as far as the disfranchisement of Bidwell. There would have been no incident of '37 if the Family Compact had not taken unfair means to keep its opponents out of Parliament.

MONTREAL Financial Times, under the heading, "Canada Now Stands as a Unit in Regard to Empire war Effort": "It is impossible to avoid the conviction that the language of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in counselling peaceful acceptance of the legislation enacted by Parliament was one of the most important influences toward this highly satisfactory issue. And in this light it is not difficult to conclude that Sir Wilfrid was thus making a greater contribution toward national unity than he could have done by supporting conscription in Parliament, whether as leader of the Opposition or as a member of a non-partisan war Government. For by supporting conscription he would necessarily have sacrificed some, at least, of his power over his French-speaking fellow-citizens, who would not have failed to charge him with treachery to their interests, and would have felt a strong impulse to desert him (as so many of them did in 1911) for those who claimed to be leaders more truly devoted to the French-Canadian cause."

INDIGNATION settled among the Liberal M. P.'s at Ottawa the last week when the House was considering the estimates. An item called for a vote of $3,500 for telephones in Hon. Albert Sevigny's constituency. This was called "looting the treasury by Act of Parliament," and was shown to be in fulfilment of Sevigny's pre-election promises. Then Hon. Martin Burrell received his share of criticism along the same lines. Compared with him, Sevigny was "a poor, innocent creature," said F. B. Carvell, who charged that "the Minister of Agriculture, in order to get votes, forces the Minister of Public works to give him $50,000 for telephone lines in his constituency, notwithstanding that the British Empire is up against it so hard for money that I dare not say how hard it is up against it."

IT is said that more young men are offering to enlist for service in the flying corps than can be taken on. Because of this standard of fitness has been considerably raised, and just now one of the requirements is that one must have passed the Matriculation examination. Of all the branches of military service the aviation branch is doubtless the most dangerous, and yet it is the most popular. Anyone can appreciate the fascination which it has, and the dangers have no terrors for youth. "Hope springs eternal in the human breast," especially in the youthful breast, and where many are going and some sure to return, each thinks that he is to be one of the fortunate ones,

GREAT BRITAIN has a food controller who really controls. He has fixed the price of potatoes, and now he is selling the price that the average consumer must pay for meat. Of course he antagonized the big interests. The large cattle interests vowed they would not sell at the price he fixed but Lord Rhonda would not be bluffed, and the public over there are delighted that strong men are on the job at last. In Canada the Food Controllership has thus far been a sham. The critics are jumping upon Food Controller Hanna and the Borden Govenment, which controls the situation and won't let him do anything is glad to let Hanna be the "goat" and get the blame.

POETS' CORNER

HERE'S THE LATEST.

A local motorist who is desperately fond of music was heard singing the following little ditty to the chorus of "Keep The Homes Fires Burning":

Keep the tail light burning,
While your motor's churning,
Though the cops seem far away
they watch for you;
There's a little flashlight,
Making darkness daylight,
Keep your eye around behind or it's five and costs.

ONLY TWENTY YEARS AGO

(Peterborough Review.)

Ladies wore bustles.
Operations were rare.
Nobody swatted the fly.
Nobody had seen a silo.
Nobody had appendicitis.
Nobody sprayed orchards.
Cream was five cents a pint.
Most young men had 'livery bills.'
Canteloupes were muskmelons.
You never heard of a "tin Lizzie."
Advertisers did not tell the truth.

Nobody cared for the price of gasoline.

Farmers came to town for their mail.

The hired girl drew one-fifty a week.

The butcher "threw in" a chunk of liver.

Folks said pneumatic tires were a joke.

Publishing a country newspaper was not a business but a pastime.

Jules Verne was the only convert to the submarine.

You stuck tubes in your ears to hear a phonograph, and it cost a dime.

Grounds for Exemption

Exemption from service under the military service act, may be claimed on eight separate grounds. The forms of application, which will be available at postoffices throughout the Dominion in the course of a few days, make this clear. The grounds are: 1. The importance of continuing employment in habitual occupation. 2. Importance of continuing employment for which he is specially qualified. 3. Importance of continuing education or training. 4. Serious hardship owing to exceptional financial obligations. 5. Serious hardship owing to exceptional business obligations. 6. Serious hardships owing to exceptional domestic position. 7. Ill-health or infirmity. 8. Adherence to religious denomination, of which the articles of faith forbid combattant service.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson XIV.—Third Quarter, For Sept. 30, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, Dan. ix, 3-19—Quarterly Review—Golden Text, Ps. ciii, 8. Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

Lesson I.—Isaiah's call to service, Isa. vi. Golden Text, Isa. vi, 8, "Here am I; send me!" (We often abbreviate the Golden Text for lack of room.) We all need such a vision as this or Rev. iv, and these are written that we may have them and know God and hear His call to us and respond as Isaiah and Jeremiah and Ezekiel did, speak His words faithfully and leave results to Him.

Lesson II.—Ahaz, the faithless king, II Chron. xxviii, 1-5, 20-27. Golden Text, Heb. xi, 6, "Without faith it is impossible to be well pleasing unto Him." Every king on David's throne was expected to represent the Lord there and be a king for God. Believers are expected to represent Christ in same measure as He did the Father. Are we good or evil in His sight?

Lesson III.—Hezekiah, the faithful king, II Chron. xxx, 1-13. Golden Text, Heb. xi, 6, "He that cometh to God must believe that He is." There can be nothing better than to do right in the sight of the Lord (xxix, 2), make His house or His kingdom our first thought and do all we can to gather people to Christ our passover, who was sacrificed for us.

Lesson IV.—Sennacherib's invasion of Judah, II Kings xix, 20-22, 28-37. Golden Text, Ps. xlvi, 1, "God is our refuge and strength." It is surely inspiring to see two men, a king and a prophet, crying to God against such a host of enemies and to see one messenger from God taking 185,000 of the enemy off the earth in one night. Let us spread all our troubles before God as this king did.

Lesson V.—God's gracious invitation, Isa. lv, 1-14. Golden Text, Isa. lv, 6: "Seek ye Jehovah while He may be found. Call upon Him; He is near." The worldwide thirst can be quenched only in God's appointed way, and that is by Himself, the fountain. No bread can satisfy but the Living Bread. He only can win the nations to Himself, and He will do it through Israel.

Lesson VI.—Manasseh's sin and repentance, II Chron. xxxiii, 9-16. Golden Text, Isa. lv, 7, "Let the wicked forsake his way: * * * our God will abundantly pardon." A great lesson to encourage great sinners to turn to a great Saviour, who never turned a true penitent away. He saved the penitent thief and Saul of Tarsus.

Lesson VII.—Josiah's good reign, II Chron. xxxiv, 1-13. Golden Text, Eccl. xii, 1, "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth." One of the youngest of all the kings, who had a very bad father, and yet he did right in the sight of the Lord, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left, and none ever turned to the Lord with all his heart as he did (II Kings xxiii, 25).

Lesson VIII.—Finding the book of the law, II Chron. xxxiv, 14-33. Golden Text, Ps. cxix, 16, "I will not forget thy word." The word was received with meekness, the people humbled themselves before the Lord, the greatest passover since the days of Samuel was kept, and a great cleansing of the land from idols followed, including some of the idolatry started by Solomon.

Lesson IX.—The captivity of Judah, II Kings xxv, 1-12. Golden Text, Ezek. xxxiii, 11, "As I live, saith the Lord Jehovah, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked." Long did He bear with them and many a time forgave them, but notwithstanding the zeal of Hezekiah and Josiah and the entreaties of Isaiah, Micah and Jeremiah they would not hearken, and the captivity came.

Lesson X.—The shepherd of captive Israel, Ezek. xxxiv, 11-27. Golden Text, Ps. xxiii, 1, "Jehovah is my shepherd; I shall not want." Not only did they return after the seventy years, but they will return for good at the end of this age and be one nation in their own land and never be divided or scattered again. Then shall they be a blessing to all nations.

Lesson XI.—Daniel's purpose of heart, Dan. i, 8-20. Golden Text, Dan. i, 8, "Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself." This was because the food from the king's table had been offered to idols and Daniel and his friends would keep themselves wholly for God. Thus thy purposed and thus they continued.

Lesson XII.—The fiery furnace, Dan. iii, 16-27. Golden Text, Isa. xliii, 2, "When thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned." The same Spirit who would not let them eat food offered to idols would not let them bow down to this image, even though it might mean their death. The same test will have to be met by many at the end of this age, Rev. xiii.

Lesson XIII.—Daniel in the lions' den, Dan. vi, 10-23. Golden Text, Ps. xxxiv, 7, "The angel of Jehovah encampeth round about them that fear Him and delivereth them." The wicked are always watching the righteous and seeking to slay them, but their triumph will be short, and the upright will have dominion in the morning (Ps. xlix, 14). If we are in the way and walking before God in sincerity we may have quietness and confidence under all circumstances (Isa. xxx, 15; Job xxxiv, 29) and sing "He is my peace" (Eph. ii, 14).

Get Behind the Wheel of a Ford and Drive

TRY it just once! Ask your friend to let you "pilot" his car on an open stretch. You'll like it, and will be surprised how easily the Ford is handled and driven.

If you have never felt the thrill of driving your own car, there is something good in store for you. It is vastly different from just riding—being a passenger. And especially so if you drive a Ford.

Young boys, girls, women and even grandfathers—thousands of them—are driving Ford cars and enjoying it. A Ford stops and starts in traffic with exceptional ease and smoothness, while on country roads and hills its strength and power show to advantage.

Buy a Ford and you will want to be behind "the wheel" constantly.

THE SPRIG of MAGIC HEATHER

Deutchman's cabin at Nakimu Cave, Glacier, B.C.

I'M just an ordinary, everyday working woman. That I earn my living with a fountain pen and a typewriter, rather than with a fine needle and sewing machine, or a woolly cloth and a pail of suds, is an accident of temperament. I get just as tired sometimes scraping up thoughts and putting them into sentences as the other woman does who fine-combs Vogue or the Pictorial for a new way to make her customer's evening coat.

But this summer I had a holiday. I've had them before, but they've taken me to towns that were bigger and dirtier and more bedizenedly sophisticated than my own. I've come back so many dollars poorer, not a pound heavier, and, if I brought mementos home with me, they were body-wearables, not soul-delightables.

But this year I had a holiday that was so different that I'd rather spell it the old way and call it a Holy Day.

I spent a whole month in the Canadian Pacific Rockies.

Do you know what I'm looking at now? It's a sprig of red heather and I wouldn't give it up for a wardrobe-trunkful of dutiables.

I hold it in my hand, the tough little brown stalk of it, and my green leaves, the purply-pink flame that it flowers into. And the walls of my den go back, melt out——

The sun is high in the cloudless heavens—the blue heavens that seem to hang like a soft curtain dropped to rest on the snow-tops of the great mountains. All morning I've followed the trail through the great trees of the Asulkan Valley, by the side of the ice-cold roaring glacial river, until the path led me back to the sources of everything.

The mountain slopes lay before me in a vast fan. Great gullies into which you could drop a city block looked like wrinkles in the brown velvet flanks. The river had its fourfold beginning on these slopes. To follow anyone of the streamlets up to its parent glacier-tongue would have been a day's joy, but the trail had elected to keep to the left according to the traffic laws of British Columbia.

At home I'm reckoned a fairly good walker. I can do a couple of miles without being tired. But in the sharp clear air of these intoxicating days I could go ten miles and get home with the lilt of pure joy in my very last step. And to pit myself against the sudden steepnesses of a trail full of surprises made me laugh out loud.

At the edge of a snowbank, where it crept to the border of the trail to peep over at the brooklet far below, my little bit of heather grew——

The vast silence of the heights was such that I wouldn't have been surprised if the brave pink bells had turned toward me and tinkled! I put my hand out slowly. And drew it back again.

I'm half Scotch according to the family tree that grows so green in my grandmother's memory. But I'd never seen heather before, except one wee pressed bit of it that compassionate friends had sent out to us.

And here it was—brave, wonderful, undauntable! I didn't need to wait to ask anybody. It was heather, heather to the staunch soul of it, and it was growing right there—it had always grown right there—for me.

I picked it and carried it, like a purple torch, right up to where the last green grass lifted itself out of the sheeted whiteness that ran straight up, steep as the pitch of a cathedral roof, to meet the far blue blaze of the sky. And when I look at it now, the wee flame on its crest lights up the way back to all the silent wonder of that day.

I have a yellow lily too that can work magic. It grew right up through the snow in an Alpine meadow where I talked to a great grey marmot who sat on a rock listening.

I have a white "here's a tail"—silky little ball that swung in the wind that blew down from the Victoria Glacier at Lake Louise.

I have a bunch of dried sweet grass that came from Banff on a day we drove to Moraine Lake under its solemn Ten Peaks.

I have a little trilobite fossil that has never seen a glass case, though its worthy of one. It means a morning of enchantment on the prehistoric upland beds of Mt. Stephen at Field.

Best of all perhaps I have something that nobody can name.

"You look different," said my next door neighbor. "I don't know just what it is. You weren't sick when you went away. But now you look like a house plant that's been in the garden all summer."

Canada Well Covered by Newspapers

Canada continues to be unusually well served by the press. This is brought out in the current issue of the Canadian Newspaper Directory compiled by A. McKim Limited, Advertising Agency, of Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and London, Eng. There are 1381 publications of all kinds now being issued in Canada, including 138 dailies, 4 tri-weeklies, 40 semi-weeklies, 921 weeklies, 222 monthlies, 1 by monthly, and 16 quarterlies. Reflecting the general prosperity which has obtained in Canada since war began, the publishing business is in a healthy condition. Since A. McKim Limited issued its first Canadian Newspaper Directory twenty-six years ago, the firm has seen the birth of many of the publications listed in its Directory and is in a position to have accurate knowledge of the field. The present day condition of the Canadian press enables the Dominion to continue to boast the largest reading public in the World in proportion to population. As usual, McKim's Newspaper Directory contains a wealth of general information regarding every town and city in Canada where a newspaper or other publication is issued, giving population, transportation, telegraph, telephone, express, banking facilities and other accommodations. It is a veritable mine of pertinent, up-to-date information for business men at a time when such facts as it contains are in great demand by far-sighted industrial leaders. The book itself is well bound, durable, neat and fit for a place on any office desk or in any library.

HOW WILL WOLFE FELL

Was Scouting Out in Front with Two Companions when Shell Burst Near Him.

Letters received here from the Front this week gave particulars of the death of Corp. Will Wolfe, one of Walkerton's heroes, who fell in battle on Aug. 19th. We reprint the letters below:—

Somewhere in France,
[illegible] Aug. 26th, 1916.

Mrs. W. Wolfe,
Walkerton, Ont.

Dear Mrs. Wolfe:—

Just a few lines to tell you that word has just come to me that your husband, Corp. Wolfe, has died of wounds, which I am very sorry to say and you have my deepest sympathy, for I have known Will for nearly ten years. We enlisted together and came to this unit together but when we came to France, Will stayed in England as a sergeant-instructor and I think Will gave up one stripe to come to France to do his bit. I knew he was wounded when we were in the battle and he died afterwards. It was from a shell that dropped close by and it was the first battle Will was in. If I can give you further information regarding Will I will be only too glad to do so and I hope you will excuse this terrible writing as I am writing it on my knee. Best regards to all the Walkerton folks. I have received some nice parcels from Walkerton I. O. D. E. and our Knox Church. I thank them very much.

I am yours respectfully.

Mrs. W. Wolfe,
Walkerton.

Dear Mrs. Wolfe:—

With great regret and sorrow I convey to you the news of Bill's death. As a chum of mine and a very dear one, I was given your address, also his mother's so that if anything should happen, we would inform one another's parents and wives. Will was killed very suddenly while on duty in Front Line. I was not with him when killed as he was doing a little scouting with two other boys, who were also killed. We were in the same platoon and had always, since his arrival to the Battalion, been together. No doubt he has spoken about us two being in this same dugout where I write this from. He was killed by a large shell. I am sure it gives me great pain to write this letter we being such great chums and I am the only N. C. O. left in the platoon. I have also his mother's address and hope will make this letter do both as I do not wish to write many letters of this kind. With my deepest sympathy, I am Yours sincerely.

Old Picture of Walkerton

Mr. L. H. McNamara has a remarkable photograph showing a bird's eye view of Walkerton about fifty years ago. It is as plain as if it were taken yesterday. Quite a number of buildings still standing are recognizable but the town has at least doubled in size since that time. The photograph is hanging in Mr. McNamara's office where anybody can see it who wishes.

Recovered From Operation

"Billy" Scott, one of Walkerton's oldest residents, is again able to be out after a very serious operation performed at the Bruce County Hospital by Dr. Hall. Although over of the eighty mark he stood the operation well and gives the greatest praise to the hospital staff for the fine care they took of him. The nurses, he said, seemed to him like angels in human form and they certainly have Billy's gratitude.

BRUCE WOMEN MEET

And Hear Patriotic Organizers from Toronto Talk—Ladies want Government to Cut Out Waste too by Prohibiting Use of Grain for Booze-Making

The mass meeting of Bruce Women called for Monday afternoon in the Town Hall drew an audience that half-filled the Town Hall. Mrs. Little of Teeswater proved a capable chairwoman. The first speaker was Mrs. Wisser, president of the Walkerton Chapter I. O. D. E. who eloquently urged the women patriotic workers of Bruce to move forward to greater triumphs. Mr. Edgar, Field Secretary of the Organization of Resources Committee, outlined the work of his organization and advocated the forming of women's auxiliaries at various points throughout the County. What the Food Controller wants, he said, is not for the people to "stint themselves, but "substitution." Bacon and beef forms a large portion of the rations of the men in the trenches and the idea was for the public to substitute other foods for these. Miss Yeates, a professional dept. worker connected with the Women's Auxiliary at Toronto, and a very fluent speaker, addressed the meeting at length. She told what the people of England were doing in conserving food, and urged the signing of the pledge cards. After her address Miss Yeates offered to answer questions. One lady asked her what she thought of oleomargine. She replied that she hadn't much experience with it in this country but said it was a "beastly" product, insinuating that it was not clean. Mrs. Short, a visitor in the audience, took her to task for her statements and in half a minute made the speaker look rather silly.

The meeting decided to allow the canvass for signing of the pledge cards to be left with various local women's organizations. In Walkerton the canvass will be undertaken by the I. O. D. E. and in the surrounding country by the local women's Institute.

The meeting passed a resolution urging the Government to prohibit the waste of grain by breweries and distilleries at a time when the people are called upon to economize.

PREPAREDNESS LEAGUE

Reorganizes for Coming Year—Protests to Government Against Soldiers' Meagre Pay—Has Nearly $400 in Treasury.

The Annual Meeting of the Walkerton branch of the Preparedness League was held in the Council Chamber on Friday the 21st. The following were present, Mrs. A. B. Klein, Mrs. Wisser Mrs. Rowland, Miss Thompson, Mrs. Sutton, Mrs. Brindley, Mrs. Wallace, Judge Klein, Revs. T. Wilson, J. Sanderson, Mr. Rowland, Rev. R. Perdue, Mr. Schwindt and Mr. McNally. By a unanimous standing vote the President and Secretary Treasurer (Mr. J. Rowland and the Rev. R. Perdue) were re-elected to the same offices for the coming year. Proposed by Judge Klein that a hearty vote of thanks be passed to the President Mr. Rowland and the Sec. Treas. for successful work done during the past year.

The financial Statement was presented by the Sec. Treasurer showing a balance in the Bank of $386.75.

Mr. G. S. Schwindt was elected First Vice President and Mrs. A. B. Klein Second Vice President. The following were elected to the Executive Committee, Mrs. R. Sutton, Mrs. Wallace, Miss Thompson, Rev. Mr. Wilson and Rev. Mr. Sanderson. It was proposed by Mr. Rowland that the Government be approached with the request to increase the pay of the boys in the Canadian Army from their present miserable pay of $1.10 per day. This was seconded by Mr. McCool.

Miss Mollie Allan of Wiarton returned home on Monday after a two months' visit with her sister, Mrs. M. Uhrig.

Miss Sutherland's Mother

Miss Sutherland, Supt. of the County Hospital telephoned a friend in town on Tuesday that her mother, who had been ailing for many months, had passed away. Further particulars have not yet been received. Miss Sutherland has been at her home in Bradford the past month owing to her mother's serious illness.

Made A Job of It.

Bold Chicken thieves made a clean-up at Mr. John Harkley's farm north of the town one night last week and took about 40 pullets. The coops are in the orchard just back of the house but the visitors got away with all they could carry without disturbing the family. As the birds are worth about a dollar a piece at present market prices the loss is rather a serious one. No clue has been discoverved yet as to the identity of the nocturnal visitors.

Buried In Dugout

Mr. Dan. Wilton has at last received official particulars from the Record Office regarding the death of his son, Pte. Alvin E. Wilton, the heroic young soldier, who was killed on Jan. 5th, 1917. A letter from Frank Beard, Director of Records, states:—"On the morning of January 5th, 1917, Pte. Wilton and two other members of a gun crew were believed to be entombed which afterwards proved to be the case, in their dugout, which received two direct hits during an enemy bombardment. Efforts to recover the bodies were unsuccessful owing to the continued shelling by the enemy and caving in of earth on digging party."

Ditner—Diebold.

A very pretty wedding took place on Monday morning Sept 24th. at 9 o'clock in the St. Joseph's Cathedral Buffalo N. Y., when Miss Anna Diebold became the bride of Mr. Andrew Ditner. The bride looked very pretty in a dress of blue satin with gold brocaded trimming with picture hat to match, and carried a boquet of bridal roses. The bride was attended by her sister Miss Clementine Diebold while the groom was supported by Mr. Harlow Kaufman of Buffalo N. Y. After the ceremony a wedding breakfast was served at the home of Miss Lee on West Ferry Street, just the immediate friends being present. The bride received many beautiful and costly presents which show the high esteem in which she was held. Those present from a distance were:—Mr. and Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Worth from Holland N. Y., Mrs. and Miss Chase and Mrs. Carroll from Lockport N. Y., and Mr. and Mrs. Clarke from Clifton Springs. Mr. and Mrs. Ditner have left on an Eastern trip and after October 15th. will make their home south of Walkerton.

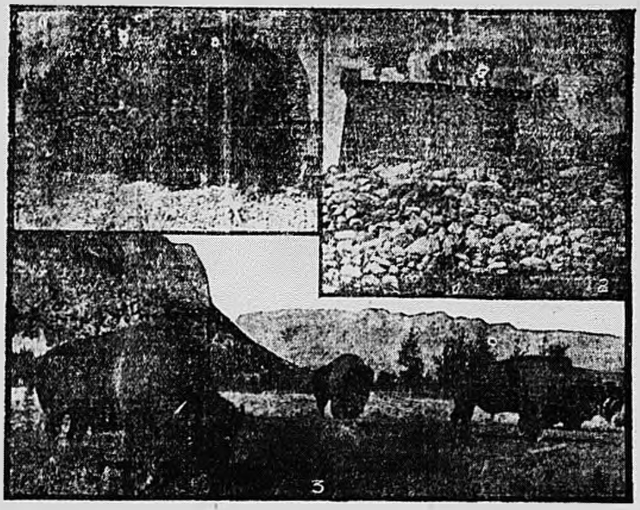
WHY MAGGIE WANTS HER MOUNTAIN



Inhabitants of the park at Banff. (1) A solitary yak. (2) Mountain goats. (3) Buffalo.

THERE are a good many of us who wish the war would hurry up and be over, for one reason and another. But Maggie has a reason that's unique. If somebody would just go and kill the Kaiser, she'd get her mountain.

Maggie's second name is Mountain, too and her last is Goat. She lives at Banff, Alberta, together with two of her friends, in a big raggedy paddock full of bushes, with a stone-built house in the centre. You can generally see her up on top of it, silhouetted against the sky, gazing disconsolately away off to where she can see that mountain of hers, fur-trimmed and full of gloriously impossible ledges. She tries to pretend the ridge pole of her present home is one of them. But it's no go. The wretched little gophers climb up and run under her very nose and she's too mournful to care!

You see, the Parks Commission, which is the Supreme Court and the Privy Council and Santa Claus and the Board of Health to Maggie, had decreed that in 1914 the mountain goats were to be transferred to a locality more in keeping with family traditions. There is a large and indefinite number of unattached mountains around Banff, inhabited only by some of Maggie's uncaught relatives, and the Commission was going to fence in one of these for its goats. The ledges would give them exercise, the big trees would enable them to rub last year's disreputable coat off their backs at the season indicated by their primitive fashion magazines, and the men interested in wool problems would have better looking goat specimens to judge from when they figured out as to whether it was or wasn't worth while to try breeding them for mohair plush.

And then came this confounded war! Camp Hughes, Camp Borden, Valcartier and the rest of the khaki pastures ate up a million times over the cost of wiring poor Maggie's billy heaven, which had to be pigeon-holed until "after the war."

That's how it comes the official in charge of all the wild wards of the park at Banff will tell you apologetically that the reason the goats look like ladies in evening dress is because they can succeed in rubbing the light wool off their necks, but the heavy matted body-growth won't come away against the switchy little bushes of the paddock. So some day he'll have to catch Maggie and her two friends and pluck them like chickens. Which proceeding Maggie will resent most bitterly.

The rocky mountain sheep have the ideal range. They are trees that soar up like trumpet notes, there are meadows carpetted with wild columbines for looking at and the sweetest of sweet grass for eating. Above all there's a real, cool, compact little mountain for big horns to show off on. There are twenty-three sheep in the pasture, five of whom are scary-eyed spring lambs. If they were to die and go to the butchers' heaven, they'd bring far more than ordinary tame Mary-sorta lambs. At least they ought to, for they taste so much better.

"There are plenty of wild ones on the mountains hereabouts," our friend in the Government told us as we left the horses outside the gate and came swishing in through the long grass, hoping to catch a glimpse of a big horn." Last year I caught three in a trap I made—a hundred and twenty by eighteen feet. It works with a gate, you know. Scares 'em a bit, but doesn't hurt 'em. They're in the——"

There was a scatter of little hoof beats and the whole flock came round from behind the big barn and stood, posed for the loveliest photo with the brown tree trunks for a background. The big horn is a wonderfully picturesque beastie with a touch of the dramatic in his make up, or he could never have arranged his harem with such an oh-you-kodak effect. But the last film had been used up trying to get Maggie properly sky-lined and we could only sigh regretfully.

There's a herd of buffalo at Banff too, but they're not of a hand shaking disposition. Nobody is allowed to go to call on the monarch of all the plains the C. P. R. has left, unless he goes on horseback or in a motor. Old Dad, the boss of Buffaloville, has even been known to charge an auto when his dinner hadn't agreed with him. And when he charges, you wonder if the Imperial Limited hasn't got off into the meadow by mistake.

But the funniest animal in the park—and doubtless the most sniffed at by the native Canadians—is the yak, who is a born Tibetan, with a face that looks halfway between an Arab steed and a moo-cow, a grandly sweeping tail, and a wonderful glossy black coat which is of normal length on his shoulders and flanks, but goes into the widest and floppiest of fringes on his legs and under body. To begin with, the sixteen Tibetans were domiciled in Brandon. But however excellent the climate of Manitoba may be, as a substitute for the Himalayas it leaves a few things to be desired. So the yaks were [illegible] up after a while and taken to Banff where they are doing splendidly.

These Men Will Help You Decide

Are you liable to be selected for service under the Military Service Act?

The answer to this question is being made readily available for you. Remember that the first class to be called includes only men between the ages of 20 and 34, both inclusive, who are unmarried or widowers without children, those married after July 6, 1917, being deemed single for the purposes of the Act.

Medical Boards are now being established throughout Canada. These Boards will examine, free of charge and obligation, all men who wish to be examined as to their physical fitness for military service. They will tell you in a very short time whether your physical condition absolves you from the call or makes you liable for selection.

It is important that you obtain this information as soon as possible. A certificate of unfitness from a Medical Board will secure for you freedom from responsibility under the Military Service Act from any Exemption Tribunal. A certificate of fitness will not preclude an appeal for exemption on any ground.

In order that you may be able to plan your future with certainty, visit a Medical Board as soon as possible and find out if you are liable to be selected. Your family and your employer are interested as well as yourself.

A good attendance, fine weather, a large number of excellent exhibits were the features of the Mildmay Fall Fair this year. The horses and cattle shown this year were of excellent quality, which shows what care the farmers take of their stock in this vicinity. The exhibits of roots, vegetables and flowers drew large crowds and judging from the apples on exhibit one would not think they were scarce this year. Two or three side shows proved a great attraction to the young men. Mr. Andrew Schmidt as usual succeeded in carrying off a large number of first and second prizes. There is no doubt that Mildmay Fair is one of the best rural fairs.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Liesmer of Detroit are spending a few days in town.

The Patriotic Bowling Tournament on Thursday was a great success. About 100 citizens of the village and neighborhood had a big time bowling and the patriotic fund was enriched to the extent of about $88. Four prizes were offered and were won by the following rinks: – First Trophy prize; R. Loughleen's rink; 2nd. Trophy prize; J. Loughleen's rink; 1st. Consolation prize; C. Kyle's rink; 2nd. Consolation, G. F. Saunders' rink.

A farewell gathering was given at the Methodist Church Monday evening in honor of Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Keeling who have been long and actively connected with the church and who are leaving the village shortly for California. Mr. Keeling has been a leader in church work for many years being Supt. of the Sunday School, teacher of the Bible Class, as well as taking an important part in the work of the Board. Mrs. Keeling was also one of the active helpers in the Church. The pastor Rev. H. B. Storey was chairman of the evening, and introduced a very nice program in which Mrs. Russell, Mrs. Fred Philips, and Mr. E. H. Ruttle, took part. Afterwards Mr. Ed. Crawford took charge, and read an address on behalf of the members of the Church, Sunday School and friends expressing their appreciation of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Keeling in connection with the Church's various activities and regret at the departure of such worthy and such highly esteemed friends. Mr Herb Moffatt then presented to Mr. Keeling a handsome gold headed cane, suitably engraved and Mrs. Geo. Welsford presented to Mrs. Keeling a beautiful gold brooch. Mr. Keeling on behalf of himself and wife made a nice reply. Speeches were also made by Messrs. Ed. Crawford and Sam Cargill. Refreshments were then served and a social hour spent. The loss of Mr. and Mrs. Keeling will be felt not only by the members of the Methodist congregation but by the entire community, Mr. Keeling being an all-round good citizen and a leader in evrything that was in the best interests of the community.

The address to Mr. and Mrs. Keeling follows:—

Cargill, Sept. 24th., 1917.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Keeling:–

We the members and friends of the Methodist Church and Sunday School assembled, have come together for the purpose of spending a pleasant evening with you, before you take your departure from our midst. We have always found in you true and faithful workers of the Church and School, who have ever had the interests of the Church at heart and more especially of the circuit to which you belong.

You were punctual and regular in attendance and prepared the work in such a way as to command the respect not only of your own church, but also of the sister churches of the community. Your work in the interests of the Church will be felt long after you have taken your departure, as you have done much towards progress in this Circuit.

We cannot let this opportunity pass without in some way though slight acknowledging our gratitude to you fo your past services, and thus ask you to accept this Cane and Brooch, which we hope you will accept in the spirit in which it is given, from your many friends, and that you will remember us even after miles of rock and prairie have separated you from us. We wish you, Mr. Keeling, your good wife and family, God speed wherever your lot is cast, and will heartily hear of your success, and welcome you and yours, if you should return to our midst. May you ever be faithful to your Creator, as you have been to the community to which you belong that a Crown of Jewels may be yours when the call comes for you to give an account of your Stewardship.

Signed on behalf of the Church and Friends.

Harvey Grice, Pres. A. B. C.
H. B. Storey, Pastor.
Mrs. Geo. Welsford,
Pres. Ladies Aid.

Mr. Wm. Frook, con. 12, Brant, was sadly bereaved in the death of his wife, Mary Gateman, which took place on Sunday evening, Sept. 23. She had been poorly since the birth of her babe six weeks ago. Mrs. Frook was a woman of fine character and the loss to her husband and family of eight children, of whom the eldest is only fifteen years, is of particularly distressing nature. She was the daughter of Mr. Joseph Gateman of Brant, and was 40 years and six months of age. The funeral takes place this afternoon from the family residence to the Brant Lutheran Cemetery.

The bowlers are to be congratulated on their success in holding the Keystone Trophy so far against all comers. On Tuesday another rink of visitors were victims of the Cargill men's prowess, when Port Elgin were beaten by a margin of 13 shots. Cargill was represented by R. A. Fowlie skip, R. Loughleen, deputy, W. D. Cargill M. P. P., second, and C. Kyle. The Port Elgin men brought the Trophy down with them and it will be put on display here this week by the Cargill Bowling Club, holders of the trophy.

We regret very much to report the death of Mrs. J. D. Schuett which took place on Saturday very suddenly while attending to her household duties, heart failure being the cause of her death. Mrs. Schuett was apparently as well as could be, when she suddenly remarked to her husband who was in the next room that she did not feel very well, and walking over towards him expired in his arms. Mrs. Schuett was a very fine woman of quiet disposition, but lovely character. She was in her 42nd year and leaves five small children and to them and her sorrowing husband, the heartfelt sympathy of the entire community is extended. All places of business were closed on Tuesday morning during the funeral and the remains were followed to their last resting place by a great concourse of friends. High mass was held at the R. C. Church, and interment took place at the Walkerton R. C. cemetery.

ALBERT VARNER

Buckingham, Que., May 3rd, 1915.

For seven years, I suffered terribly from Severe Headaches and Indigestion. I had belching gas from the stomach, bitter stuff would come up into my mouth after eating, while at times I had nausea and vomiting, and had chronic Constipation. I went to several doctors and wrote to a specialist in Boston but without benefit. I tried many remedies but nothing did me good. Finally, a friend advised "Fruit-a-tives". I took this grand fruit medicine and it made me well. I am grateful to "Fruit-a-tives", and to everyone who has miserable health with Constipation and Indigestion and Bad Stomach, I say take "Fruit-a-tives", and you will get well".

fort was toward the increase of their own power. These people all surged back and forth good naturedly and shouted at each other and disappeared with great importance up the side streets or darted out with equal business from all points of the compass.

We tacked across to the doors of the Parker House. There after some search was made we found the proprietor. He, too, seemed very busy, but he spared time to trudge ahead of us up two rickety flights of raw wooden stairs to a loft, where he indicated four canvas bunks on which lay as many coarse blue blankets.

Perhaps a hundred similar bunks occupied every available inch in the little loft.

"How long you going to stay?" he asked us.

"Don't know; a few days."

"Well, $6 apiece, please."

"For how long?"

"For tonight."

"Hold on!" expostulated Talbot. "We can't stand that, especially for these accommodations. At that price we ought to have something better. Haven't you anything in the second story?"

The proprietor's busy air fell from him, and he sat down on the edge of one of the canvas bunks.

"I thought you boys were from the mines," said he. "Your friend here fooled me." He pointed his thumb at Yank. "He looks like an old timer. But now I look at you I see you're greenhorns. Just get here today? Have a smoke?"

He produced a handful of cigars, of which he lit one.

"We just arrived," said Talbot, somewhat amused at this change. "How about that second story?"

"I want to tell you boys a few things," said the proprietor. "I get $60,000 a year rent for that second story just as she stands. That tent next door belongs to my brother-in-law. It is just 15 by 25 feet, and he rents it for $40,000."

"Gamblers?" inquired Talbot.

"You've guessed it. So you see I ain't got any beds to speak of down there. In fact, here's the whole layout."

"But we can't stand $6 a night for these things," expostulated Johnny. "Let's try over at the other place."

"Try ahead, boys," said the proprietor quite good naturedly. "You'll find her the same over there and everywhere else." He arose. "Best leave your plunder here until you find out. Come down and have a drink?"

CHAPTER VIII.

Start to Make Money.

WE found the City hotel offered exactly the same conditions as did the Parker House, except that the proprietor was curt and had no time for us at all. From that point, still dissatisfied, we extended our investigations beyond the Plaza. We found ourselves ankle deep in sandhills on which grew coarse grass and a sort of sage. Crazy, ramshackle huts made of all sorts of material were perched in all sorts of places. Hundreds of tents had been pitched, beneath which and in front of which an extremely simple housekeeping was going in. Hunt as we might we could find no place that looked as though it would take lodgers. Most of even the better looking houses were simply tiny skeletons covered with paper, cloth or paint. By painstaking persistence we kept at it until we had inquired of every building of any pretensions. Then, somewhat discouraged, we picked our way back to the shore after our heavier goods.

The proprietor of the Parker House greeted us with unabated good nature.

"I know how you boys feel," said he. "There's lots in your fix. You'd better stick here tonight and then get organized to camp out if you're going to be here long. I suppose, though, you're going to the mines. Well, it'll take you several days to make your plans and get ready. When you get back from the mines you won't have to think about these things."

"There's plenty of gold?" ventured Johnny.

"Bushels."

"I should think you'd be up there."

"I don't want any better gold mine than the old Parker House," said he comfortably.

We paid him $24.

By now it was late in the afternoon. The wind had dropped, but over the hills to seaward rolled a soft beautiful bank of fog. The sun was blotted out behind it, and a chill fell. The crowds about the Plaza thinned.

We economized our best at supper, but had to pay some $8 for the four of us. The bill was a la carte and contained such items as grizzly steak, antelope, elk and wild duck and geese. Grizzly steak, I remember, cost a dollar and a quarter. By the time we had finished it had grown dark. The lamps were alight, and the crowds were beginning to gather. All the buildings and the big tent next door were a blaze of illumination. The sounds of music and singing came from every side. A holiday spirit was in the air.

Johnny and I were crazy to be up and doing, but Talbot sternly repressed us, and Yank agreed with his decision by an unusually emphatic nod.

"It is all a lot of fun, I'll admit," said he, "but this is business, and we've got to face it. Sit down here on the edge of this veranda, and let's talk things over. How much money have you got, Yank?"

"Two hundred and twenty dollars," replied Yank promptly.

"You're partners with me, Frank, so I know our assets," said Talbot with tact. "Johnny?"

"Hanged if I know," replied that youth. "I've got quite a lot. I keep it in my pack."

"Well, go find out," advised Talbot.

Johnny was gone for some time. We smoked and listened to the rather blatantly mingled strains of music and watched the figures of men hurrying by in the spangled darkness.

Johnny returned very much excited. "I've been robbed!" he cried.

"Robbed? Is your money all gone?"

"No; there's a little left, but"—

Talbot laughed quietly.

"Sit down, Johnny, and cool off," he advised. "If anybody had robbed you they'd have taken the whole kit and kaboodle. Did you come out ahead on those monte games?"

Johnny blushed and laughed a little.

"I see what you're at, but you're away off there. I just played for small stakes."

"And lost a lot of them. I sort of look out your game. But that's all right. How much did the 'robbers' leave you?"

"Twelve dollars besides what I have in my clothes, $21 in all," said Johnny.

"Well, that's pretty good. You beat Frank and me to death. There's our total assets," said Talbot and laid a ten dollar gold piece and a dime on his knee.

"We'll call that dime a curiosity," said he, "for I notice a quarter is the smallest coin they use out here. Now you see that we've got to talk business. Frank and I haven't got enough to live on for one more day."

"There's enough among us"— began Yank.

"You mean you already have your share of the partnership finances," corrected Talbot quickly. "If we're going to be partners, and that's desired and understood, I suppose"—we all nodded emphatic agreement—"we must all put in the same amount. I move that said amount be $220 apiece. Yank, you can loaf tomorrow. You've got your share all made up. You can put in the day finding out all about getting to the mines and how much it costs and what we will need."

"All right: I'll do it," said Yank.

"As for the rest of us," cried Talbot, "we've got to rustle up $220 each before tomorrow evening!"

"How?" I asked blankly.

"How should I know? Out there"—he waved his hand abroad at the flickering lights—"there is the Golden City, challenging every man as he enters her gates. She offers opportunity and fortune. All a man has to do is go and take them! Accept the challenge!"

"The only way I could take them would be to lift them off some other fellow at the point of a gun," said Johnny gloomily.

We talked the situation over thoroughly and then turned in, having lost our chance to see the sights. Beneath us and in the tent next door went on a tremendous row of talking, laughing and singing that for a little while prevented me from falling asleep. But the last month had done wonders for me in that way, and shortly I dropped off.

Hours later I awakened, shivering with cold, to find the moonlight pouring into the room and the bunks all occupied. My blanket had disappeared, which accounted for my dreams of icebergs. At first I felt inclined to raise a row, then thought better of it and by careful manipulation abstracted two good blankets from the most unprotected of my neighbors and soon slept soundly.

We went downstairs and out into the sweetest of mornings. The sun was bright, the sky clear and blue. The wind had not yet risen; balmy warmth showered down through every particle of the air. I had felt some May days like this back on our old farm. Somehow they were associated in my mind with Sunday morning and the drawling, lazy clucking of hens. Only here there were no hens, and if it was Sunday morning—which it might have been—nobody knew it.

We ate a frugal breakfast and separated on the agreed business of the day. Yank started for the water front to make inquiries as to ways of getting to the mines. Talbot set off at a businesslike pace for the hotel as though he knew fully what he was about. Johnny wandered rather aimlessly to the east, and I as aimlessly to the west.

It took me just one hour to discover that I could get all of any kind of work that any dozen men could do and at wages so high that at first I had to ask over and over again to make sure I had heard aright. Only none of them would bring me in $220 by evening. The further I looked into that proposition the more absurd, of course, I saw it to be. I could earn from $20 to $50 by plain day labor at some job, or I could get fabulous salaries by the month or year, but that was different. After determining this to my satisfaction I came to the sensible conclusion that I would make what I could.

The first thing that caught my eye after I had come to this decision was a wagon drawn by four mules coming down the street at a slow walk. The sight did not impress me particularly, but every storekeeper came out from his shop and every passerby stopped to look with respect as the outfit wallowed along. It was driven by a very large, grave, blond man with a twinkle in his eye.

"That's John A. McGlynn," said a man next my elbow.

"Who's he?" I asked.

The man looked at me in astonishment.

"Don't know who John McGlynn is?" he demanded. "When did you get here?"

"Last night."

"Oh! Well, John has the only American wagon in town. Brought it out from New York in pieces and put it together himself. Broke four wild California mules to drag her. He's a wonder!"

I could not then see quite how this exploit made him such a wonder, but on a sudden inspiration I splashed out through the mud and climbed into the wagon.

McGlynn looked back at me.

"Freightin'," said he, "is $20 a ton, and at that rate it'll cost you about $30, you dirty hippopotamus. These ain't no safe movers, these mules!"

Unmoved, I clambered up beside him.

"I want a job," said I, "for today only."

"Do ye now?"

"Can you give me one?"

"I can, mebbe. And do you understand the inner aspirations of mules, mebbe?"

"I was brought up on a farm."

"And the principles of elementary navigation by dead reckoning?"

I looked at him blankly.

"I mean mudholes," he explained. "Can you keep out of them?"

"I can try."

He pulled up the team, handed me the reins and clambered over the wheel.

"You're hired. At 6 o'clock I'll find you and pay you off. You get $20."

"What am I to do?"

"You go to the shore, and you rustle about whenever you see anything that looks like freight, and you look at it, and when you see anything marked with a diamond and an H inside of it you pile it on and take it up to Howard Mellin & Co. And if you can't lift it, then leave it for another trip, and bullyrag those skinflints at H. M. & Co.'s to send a man down to help you."

"What's that, John?" inquired a cool, amused voice.

McGlynn and I looked around. A tall, perfectly dressed figure stood on the sidewalk surveying us quizzically. This was a smooth shaven man of perhaps thirty-five years of age, grave faced, clean cut, with an air of rather ponderous, slow dignity that nevertheless became his style very well. He was dressed in tall white hat, a white winged collar, a black stock, a long tailed blue coat with gilt buttons, an embroidered white waistcoat, dapper buff trousers and varnished boots. He carried a polished cane and wore several heavy pieces of gold jewelry—a watch fob, a scarfpin, and the like. His movements were leisurely, his voice low. It seemed to me then that somehow the perfection of his appointments and the calm deliberation of his movement made him more incongruous and remarkable than did the most bizarre whims of the miners.

"Is it yourself, Judge Girvin?" replied McGlynn. "I'm just telling this young man that he can't have the job of driving my little California canaries for but one day because I've hired a fine lawyer from the east at $275 a month to drive my mules for me."

"It'll cost you about $30, you dirty hippopotamus."

"You have done well," said Judge Girvin in his grave, courteous tones. "For the whole business of a lawyer is to know how to manage mules and asses so as to make them pay."

I enjoyed my day hugely. My eminent position on the driver's seat—eminent both actually and figuratively—gave me a fine opportunity to see the sights and to enjoy the homage men seemed inclined to accord the only wagon in town. The feel of the warm air was most grateful. Such difficulties as offered served merely to add zest to the job. At noon I ate some pilot bread and a can of sardines bought from my employers. About 2 o'clock the wind came up from the sea and the air filled with the hurrying clouds of dust.

At 6 o'clock a small boy boarded me.

"You're to drive the mules up to McGlynn's and unhitch them and leave them," said he. "I'm to show you the way."

"Where's McGlynn?" I asked.

"He's getting his mail."

CHAPTER IX.

We Compare Notes.

WE found McGlynn in line about a block down the street. When he saw me coming he pulled a fat buckskin bag from his breeches pocket, opened its mouth and shook a quantity of its contents by guess into the palm of his hand.

"There you are," said he; "that's near enough. I'm a pretty good guesser. I hope you took care of the mules all right. You ought to, you're from a farm."

"I fixed 'em."

"And the mud? How many times did you get stuck?"

"Not at all."

He looked at me with surprise.

"Would you think of that now?" said he. "You must have loaded her light."

"I did."

"Did you get all the goods over?"

"Yes."

"Well, I'll acknowledge you're a judgmatical young man, and if you want a job with me I'll let that lawyer go I spoke to the judge about. He handed it to me then, didn't he?" He laughed heartily. "No? Well, you're right. A man's a fool to work for any one but himself. Where's your bag? Haven't any? How do you carry your dust? Haven't any? I forgot; you're a tenderfoot, of course." He opened his buckskin sack with his teeth, and poured back the gold from the palm of his hand. Then he searched for a moment in all his pockets and produced a most peculiar chunk of gold metal. It was nearly as thick as it was wide, shaped roughly into an octagon, and stamped with initials. This he handed to me.

"It's about a fifty dollar slug," said he; "you can get it weighed. Give me the change next time you see me."

"But I may leave for the mines tomorrow," I objected.

"Then leave the change with Jim Becket of the El Dorado."

"How do you know I'll leave it?" I asked curiously.

"I don't," replied McGlynn bluntly. "But if you need $25 worse than you do a decent conscience then John A. McGlynn isn't the man to deny you!"

Johnny and I left for the hotel.

"I didn't know you expected any mail," said I.

"I don't."

"But thought I saw you in line"—

"Oh, yes! When I saw the mail sacks it struck me that there might be quite a crowd; so I came up as quickly as I could and got in line. There were a number before me, but I got a place pretty well up in front. Sold the place for $5, and only had to stand there about an hour at that."

"Good head!" I admired. "I'd never have thought of it. How have you gotten on?"

"Pretty rotten," confessed Johnny. "I tried all morning to find a decent opportunity to do something or deal in something, and then I got mad and plunged in for odd jobs. I've been a regular errand boy. I made $2 carrying a man's bag up from the ship."

"How much all told?"

"Fifteen. I suppose you've got your pile."

"That twenty-five you saw me get is the size of it."

Johnny brightened. We moved up closer in a new intimacy and sense of comradeship over delinquency. It relieved both to feel that the other, too, had failed. To enter the Plaza we had to pass one of the larger of the gambling places.

"I'm going in here," said Johnny suddenly.

He swung through the open doors, and I followed him.

The place was comparatively deserted, owing probably to the distribution of mail. We had full space to look about us, and I was never more astonished in my life. The outside of the building was rough and unfinished as a barn, having nothing but size to attract or recommend. The interior was the height of lavish luxury. A polished mahogany bar ran down one side, backed by huge gilt framed mirrors before which were pyramided fine glasses and bottles of liquor. The rest of the wall space was thickly hung with more plate mirrors, dozens of well executed oil paintings and strips of tapestry. At one end was a small raised stage on which lolled a half dozen darkies with banjos and tambourines. The floor was covered with a thick velvet carpet. Easy chairs, some of them leather upholstered, stood about in every available corner.

The game was roulette. Johnny and the dealer evidently recognized each other, for a flash of the eye passed between them, but they gave no other sign. Johnny studied the board a moment, then laid $22 in coin on one of the numbers. The other players laid out small bags of gold dust. The wheel spun and the ball rolled. Two of the men lost. Their dust was emptied into a drawer beneath the table and the bags tossed back to them. The third had won. The dealer deftly estimated the weight of his bet, lifting it in the flat of his left hand, then spun several gold pieces toward the winner. He seemed quite satisfied. The gambler stacked a roll of twenty dollar pieces, added one to them and thrust them at Johnny. I had not realized that the astounding luck of winning off a single number had befallen him.

"Ten to one—$220!" he muttered to me.

The other three players were laying their bets for the next turn of the wheel. Johnny swept the gold pieces into his pocket and laid back the original stake against even. He lost. Thereupon he promptly arose and left the building.

I followed him to the hotel somewhat gloomily, for I was now the only member of our party who had not made good the agreed amount of the partnership. It is significant that never for a moment did either Johnny or myself doubt that Talbot would have the required sum. Johnny, his spirits quite recovered, whistled like a lark.

We arrived just in time for the first supper call and found Talbot and Yank awaiting us. Yank was as cool and taciturn and nodded to us as indifferently as ever. Talbot, however, was full of excitement. His biscuit brown complexion had darkened and flushed until he was almost Spanish black, and the little devils in his eyes led a merry dance between the surface and unguessed depths. He was also exceedingly voluble and, as usual when in that mood, aggravatingly indirect. He joked and teased and carried on like a small boy and insisted on ordering an elaborate dinner and a bottle of champagne in the face of even Johnny's scandalized expostulations. When Johnny protested against expenditure it was time to look out.

"Ten to one—$220!" he muttered to me.

We lit our pipes and sat down at one end of the veranda, where we would not be interrupted.

"Fire ahead, Yank," advised Talbot.

"There's two ways of going to the mines," said Yank. "One is to go overland by horses to Sutter's Fort or the new town of Sacramento and then up from there into the foothills of the big mountains way yonder. The other is to take a boat and go up river to Sacramento and then pack across with horses."

"How much is the river fare?" asked Talbot.

"You have to get a sailboat. It costs about $40 apiece."

"How long would it take?"

"Four or five days."

"And how long from here to Sutter's Fort by horse?"

"About the same."

"Depends, then, on whether horses are cheaper here or there."

"They are cheaper there. Or we can get our stuff freighted in by Greasers and hoof it ourselves."

"Then I should think we ought to have a boat."

"I got one," said Yank.

"Good for you!" cried Talbot. "You're a man after my own heart! Well, Johnny?"

Johnny told his tale a little proudly and produced his required $220.

"You had luck," said Talbot noncommittally, "and you ran a strong risk of coming back here without a cent, didn't you? I want to ask you one question, Johnny. If you had lost would you have been willing to have taken the consequences?"

"What do you mean?" asked Johnny blankly.

"Would you have been willing to have dropped out of this partnership?"

Johnny stared.

"I mean," said Talbot kindly, "that you had no right to try to get this money by merely a gambler's chance unless you were willing to accept the logical result if you failed. It isn't fair to the rest of us."

"I see what you mean," said Johnny slowly. "No; I hadn't thought of it that way."

"Well, as I said, you had luck," repeated Talbot cheerfully, "so we needn't think of it further." It was characteristic that Johnny took this veiled rebuke from Talbot Ward in a meek and chastened spirit. From any one else his high temper could never stand even a breath of criticism. "How about you, Frank?" Talbot asked me.

I detailed my experiences in a very few words and exhibited my gold slug.

"That's the best I can do," I ended, "and half of that does not belong to me. I can, however, in a few days scrape up the full amount. There is plenty to do here. And, barring bull luck, like Johnny's, I don't see much show of beating that unless a man settled down to stay here."

Talbot stared at me ruminatively until I began to get restive; then he withdrew his eyes. He made no comment.

"I suppose you have your money," suggested Yank to him after a pause.

"Oh, yes!" said Talbot as though awaking from profound reverie.

"Well, tell us about it. How did you get it? How long did it take you?"

"About half an hour. I figured that everybody in a place like this would be wanting news. So I sorted out that bundle of old newspapers you fellows were always laughing at, and I went out and sold them."

"How much did you get for them?" asked Johnny.

"A dollar apiece for most and 50 cents for the rest. I came out $270 ahead all told. That, with Frank's and my $10, gave me $80 above the necessary amount."

Johnny arose and kicked himself solemnly.

"For not guessing what newspapers were good for," he explained. "Go on! What next? What did you do with the rest of the day?"

"Two thousand dollars—oh, of course!" murmured Johnny.

"So then," continued Talbot, "I hustled ashore and went to see some of my merchant friends. In two hours I had contracts with twelve of them that totaled $6,000."

"Why didn't some of them go out and hire ships on their own account?" asked Yank shrewdly.

"Because I didn't mention the word 'ship' until I had their business," said Talbot. "I just guaranteed them storage, waterproof, practically fireproof, dustproof and within twenty-four hours. I guess most of them thought I was crazy, but as it didn't cost them anything they were willing to take a chance."

"Then you didn't raise your $10,000 from them in advance payments!" I marveled.

"Certainly not. That would have scared off the whole lot of them. But I got their agreements. I told you it took me two hours. Then I walked up the street figuring where I'd get the money. Of course I saw, I'd have Philharmonic at Mildmay.

Mildmay Gazette:—One of the most enjoyable and successful entertainments ever given at Mildmay was the concert in the town hall on Tuesday evening under the auspices of the local Red Cross Society. The entire program was given by the Walkerton Philharmonic Society, an organization of about forty members, under the leadership of Mr. E. H. Leeson. All their numbers were exceptionally well rendered. The different parts were brought under perfect control and blended harmoniously together, and the most difficult selections were given perfect rendition. The solos by Mrs. C. Stephan were excellent. Mrs. Stephan's voice possesses a sweetness, purity and the audience was genuinely delighted. The recitations by Misses Jean Norrish and Hazel Irwin, and the violin selections by Miss Scanlan were also enjoyed. The manner in which the entire program was given was an eloquent testimonial to Mr. Leeson's ability as instructor. The hall was filled to the doors, the receipts being about $110. The Walkerton people gave their services free. The only feature that marred the complete enjoyment of the program was the lack of order among those seated at the rear of the hall.

Stewart Lyon Returning.

Stewart Lyon, representative of the Canadian Press at the front, is returning to Canada. Under the original engagement he was to remain at the front six months. He has now been there for eight months, during which period his dispatches have been a regular feature of practically all Canadian daily newspapers. It is understood that he has been greatly dissatisfied with the censorship restrictions which compelled him to omit matter he wished to send and which Canada wants.

Politicians Are Busy.

About the busiest little quartette on the Hanover show grounds last Friday afternoon were politicians. Mr. R. J. Ball M. P., came home from Ottawa to be present. Mr. W. H Wright of Owen Sound, his rival in the Dominion contest, was on deck shaking hands. Dr. Jamieson of Durham was also present and was as urbane as usual, while Dr. Mearns of Hanover, his antagonist for the Legislature, put in a busy afternoon. Politics these days are a strenuous affair.—Hanover Post.

IS 80TH. BIRTHDAY

Mr. William Heidmiller, Well-known Riverdale Pioneer Called Away—Came to Greenock Bush Sixty-six Years Ago.

Mr. Wm. Heidmiller, a highly esteemed resident of Riversdale, and one of the earliest pioneers of Greenock Tp. passed away at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Herman Weise, of Formosa on Friday. It was his 80th birthday. Mr. Heidmiller had a sturdy frame, measuring six feet two inches in height, and had never been troubled with ill health. It was only last winter that old age began to tell upon him and he had been ailing since then. Death was due to old age and heart trouble. Mr. Heidmiller was born at Prague, Bohemia, and came to America with his parents as a lad of twelve. For two years they resided in New York State, coming from there to Greenock in 1851. At that time the Queen's Bush was a trackless woods, and Mr. Heidmiller and his parents, experienced all the hardships incident to pioneer life. They cleared two farms, on one of which Mr. Heidmiller lived up to the time of his death, the other being now owned by his son William. Mr. Heidmiller was known as a good citizen and good neighbor, bringing up a family that was a credit to him in his old old age. Until very recently, he was quite active. Two years ago he paid a visit to his sons in the West and had planned to go West again this year if his health was good. His wife, who shared with him the hardships of the early days and was a native of the same town in the Old Land, predeceased him six years ago. There are left to mourn, a family of four sons and three daughters: Frank and Tom of Alberta; Will and Albert of Greenock; Mrs. Bettinger and Mrs. Herman Weise of Formosa; Mrs. Jacob Schurter of Greenock. The funeral was held at Riversdale on Monday morning, conducted by Rev. Father Cappe and was largely attended.

KILLED IN BATTLE

Pte Daniel McPhail, Well-known Young Walkerton Soldier Fell in Action in Flanders on Sept. 30th.

Word that another Walkerton son had made the great sacrifice came in a telegram to Mr. and Mrs. John McPhail on Monday afternoon, which stated that their youngest son Pte. Daniel McPhail was officially reported killed in action on September 24th, 1917.

Dan was a fine young chap of 23 years. He was a graduate of Walkerton High School and later of the Business College and everybody who knew him had a good word to say for him. Before enlisting with the 234th (Beavers) Batt'n at Toronto on February 15th, 1916, he had been two years as book-keeper with the Canadian Swift Co. He left England last May with a draft for France and had been four months at the Front. A cousin, Kenneth McLennan of Toronto, enlisted in the same battalion, went to France with the same draft, was in the same platoon, and no doubt was near him at the end. Another Bruce boy, Stan Johnston was in the same platoon but had been in the hospital lately.

Landed At Quebec.

Two Walkerton soldiers, Ptes. Norman Webb and David Seiling were reported among those who landed at Halifax on Monday. They are expected to reach Walkerton some time this week

Moving Express Office

Mr. H. J. Boan, Canadian Express Agent, has rented the building next door to Andy Johnston's barber shop, which will be thoroughly renovated and will move his office from present quarters. Before coming here three years ago, Mr Boan had a thorough training in the express business and has by all round good service increased his business tremendously. He will now engage a teamster and look after the office end himself. Mr. Boan has rented Mr. Alex Haas's new brick residence in the West Ward.

After The Cheap Fish.

Mayor Johnston wrote the Fisheries Dept. at Toronto last week to get in on the 12½ cent fish. If the Mayor can get a supply he will invite the local dealers to handle. In the meantime one of the local butchers in handling sealfish at 12½ cents a lb. which certainly comes a whole lot cheaper, than a quarter for a chunk of stake! Those who have tried the sealfish which was sold yesterday for the first time, say it goes fine.

Home On Leave

Capt. "Had" Robertson arrived home from the Front on Saturday night on two months' leave. Capt. Robertson is incapacitated for the present by a broken shoulder-bone, which was fractured when his horse fell with him. Capt. Robertson went to England with the 34th Batt'n in 1915 and later transferred to the Canadian Engineers. He has seen nearly two years of active service in France. His two brothers, Major Roy Robertson and Lieut. Arthur Robertson are both in France, Roy with the Engineers and Arthur in the Artillery.

Long Way To Go

Young men of Bruce County who will be called out under the first draft, will have a long journey to go for Medical examinations. The nearest Medical Board is at Harriston. This means that the boys from Tobermory, for instance, will have to drive fifty miles to the Railroad at Wiarton, and then travel over sixty miles by rail to get to the Medical Board at Harriston. While Bruce County has no Medical Board, Wellington County has two one at Guelph and one at Harriston. This hardship might yet be avoided by the appointment of an additional Board to sit at Wiarton or at some such point which would better serve the people of the Northern Peninsula.

Notice to Subscribers In Arrears

Constant increase in the cost of publishing a weekly newspaper has brought the average publisher's profit on subscriptions so close to the vanishing point that it has become more than ever necessary to insist that subscribers, to enjoy the paid-in-advance price of $1.50, pay their subscriptions strictly in advance, otherwise they are carried at a financial loss. A few subscriptions allowed to run in arrears soon amount to many hundreds of dollars and are a very poor asset when it comes to paying cash for printing inks, type, paper and other items as a publisher must do in order to buy right. We are at present engaged in clearing up our subscription books and invite the cooperation of our readers. While we are loath to take any action that would jeopardize the friendly relations between ourselves and even our tardiest subscribers, we must insist that subscribers in arrears pay up without delay. To those who do not respond to this notice, it will be necessary to charge not only the $2 a year rate but also the extra cost of collection, which will at once be added the moment we hand the accounts to our solicitors for collection which we propose to do thirty days after the first publication of this notice.

To Train As A Nurse.

Miss Pauline Clapp left this week for Toronto to train as a nurse at the Hospital for Sick Children. On Monday evening Miss Clapp was presented with a prayer book and hymn book by Mrs. (Rev.) R. Perdue, on behalf of the members of the Sunday School and Choir of St. Thomas Church.

A Lively Runaway

Mr. Abe Roward of Brant narrowly escaped serious injury on Monday morning when his driver bolted out of the lane at the side of Patrick's grocery throwing him and the contents of the rig violently to the ground as the horse turned up street in its mad career. It was just at the noon hour and some passersby succeeded in stopping the animal before it got very far. The horse is usually quiet and Mr. Roward who had been waiting in the rig, picked up a newspaper to read, allowing the lines to fall down. The rustle of the newspaper apparently caused the trouble.

Barn Burned in Sullivan

On Saturday evening about 8 o'clock a severe electrical storm passed over this district and the barn of Mrs. A. Bluhm of 4th con., Sullivan, was struck. The barn and contents, including all of this season's crop, together with the implements and some stock were completely destroyed. The crop had just been threshed and the grain was in the granary. The neighbors gathered quickly, but the flames spread so rapidly that all help was of no avail. The loss, which will be a heavy one at this time of year, is partially covered by insurance. The shock was so severe that it broke the windows of the house, which is about 100 or 150 feet from the barn.

The Birth of a Nation.

Actual battles are shown with tens of thousands of soldiers in the conflict in the Birth of a Nation, which the Movieland Management is bringing to Walkerton Opera House on the 12th. and 13th. 18,000 people participated in the telling of the story. Three thousand horses were used to give the cavalry and other thrilling effects of the wild dashes over miles of territory. Cities were built up only to be destroyed by fire. The total cost of the entire production was in the neighborhood of $500,000. Five hundred costumers and seamstresses worked for three months to make the costumes worn by the people. 10,000 yards of cloth were worked into the costumes worn by the women while 25,000 yards of white muslin were used up in the regalia of the Ku-Klux-Klansmen.

H. S. FIELD SPORTS

Various Championships Keenly Contested for by High School Scholars at Fair Grounds.

The High School Field Sports were held at the Exhibition Grounds on Friday afternoon. The weather threatened but turned out very nicely and there was a good crowd present. The Public School pupils, too, had a holiday to permit them to attend. Both boys and girls showed considerable prowess on the field, making very good time in the races. For the Senior Boys' Championship there was a close contest between Clayton Fortune and Will. Ramsey, Clayton winning out by a single point (17 to 16). Erma Glave easily won the girls Senior Championship with 8 points. Cecil Wilton had things very much his own way in the Junior boys', with 20 points, Lorne Hergott coming second with 9 points. J. Norrish and A. Lambertus tied for the Girls' Junior, with 5 points each.

In the various events first place counted as 3 points, second 2 points, third as 1 point.

Lane—McCrum

A quiet wedding was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry McCrum, Colborne St., at High Noon on Tuesday, October 2nd, 1917, when their youngest daughter Elfreida Blagden, was united in marriage to Dr. Edward A. Lane, only son of the late Edward A. Lane of Brooklyn, N. Y. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Rural Dean Perdue M. A., only the immediate relatives being present. Dr. Lane is one of the staff of a New York Hospital taking surgical work, and so many of his associates are going as officers in the Medical Corps that Dr. and Mrs. Lane left immediately for New York, arranging to take their wedding trip later on.

VOLUME XLIX NUMBER 39
WALKERTON, OCTOBER 4th, '17

IT now appears that the attack on Lens cost the Canadians between eight and nine thousand casualities. And the attack did not succeed.

WITH a fifty percent. increase in the number of motor licenses issued during the year, it doesn't look as though Canada was seriously depressed by war conditions.

THE people would take the "famine and world hunger" cry more seriously if the government cut out the mammoth waste of grain for making booze.

DEAR women, now you are to get the vote after the election. Sir Robert Borden has so promised. Will you not remain quiet in the meantime, more particularly you who are classed as aliens?

THE government asks maximum egg production, with screenings for feed. But it can't be done. That story about the hens doing well on sawdust and raising chicks, one with a wooden leg, another a woodpecker, etc., wasn't supposed to be taken seriously.

SIR George Foster told a Toronto audience that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was responsible for the wartime election. A good beginning. Very soon we expect to hear that Sir Wilfrid started the war; discovered Sir Joseph Wesley Flavelle; and brought along the early frost.

A young man 21 years of age who has not enlisted can vote. A young woman 21 years of age who has no male relatives in khaki cannot vote, even though she is as loyal and patriotic as the female relatives of the boys in khaki who have a vote.

A fire occurred on Thursday evening of last week on the fourth Concession of Elderslie, near Chesley, when a fine barn belonging to Mr. E. Sternall., was destroyed with all his crop of grain and hay and all his implements. There was little insurance on the building and Mr. Sternall will be a heavy loser.

SUNDAY SCHOOL

Lesson I.—Fourth Quarter, For Oct. 7, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, Ps. lxxxv and cxxvi. Memory Verses, Ps. lxxxv, 10, 11. Golden Text, Ps. cxxvi, 5—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

We have been speaking in recent lessons of some of God's great circles in connection with the heavenly orbs of His universe and the great truths of His word. Coming to the Psalms, in which we shall have at least two lessons this quarter, we find the same thing. But in all Scripture the Lord God of Israel, the Lord Jesus Christ, is ever the center. He is the perfect man of Ps. i in contrast to the wicked one of the same Psalm, but each includes those who are theirs. He is the one so greatly to be praised in Ps. cl. His kingdom of Ps. ii is the same as that of Ps. cxlix. These Psalms are Israel's fivefold response to the five books of the law, each book corresponding in some measure to each book of the Pentateuch. The ending of the first four books of Psalms are xli, lxxii, lxxxix, cvi, and are easily noted by the double "Amen" of the first three and the "Amen, Hallelujah!" of the fourth. Christ is no doubt in all the Psalms, as He is in all the Scriptures, according to His own testimony in Luke xxiv, 27, 44. His sufferings and His glory are everywhere set forth, and the setting up of His kingdom, with Israel as the center, at His coming in glory to judge and to reign.

The present age of gathering the church from all the nations is a mystery first revealed to Paul, according to Eph. iii, 1-6; Rom. xvi, 25-27; Col. i, 26, 27, but everywhere in all the book there are heart messages for every individual believer, whether Jew or gentile. David and Asaph and Moses and perhaps others whom God inspired to write the Psalms saw, as did the prophets, the future, on to the coming of the kingdom, by the Holy Spirit who spoke to them and through them. They not only foresaw the near but also the faroff fulfillments of the purposes of God, the restoration from Babylon and the still future restoration from all nations where they are still scattered. Both of the Psalms of our lesson may easily cover both events and give us many a glad word for our own hearts. Understanding that the thanksgiving and rejoicing are primarily that of Israel, let us as believers appropriate all we can. The nation shall be reborn suddenly and the iniquity of their land removed in one day, when they shall look upon their Messiah and receive Him as their God at His coming in glory (Isa. xxv, 8, 9; lxvi, 5-13; Zech. iii, 8, 9).

It is impossible to have real lasting joy apart from the forgiveness of sins, for until that becomes our experience the wrath of God is still upon us (lxxxv, 1-3; John iii, 36). It is the privilege of every believer to proclaim to others the forgiveness of sins through Jesus Christ because of His finished work (Acts xiii, 38, 39) and by John i, 12, and I John ii, 12, any one can see how to become a child of God and know their sins forgiven. Then can we sing the Song of Israel after they shall have received Him and make even now the words of Isa. xii our very own. If we are not made glad by such assurances as that He will never remember our sins, and that we are even now delivered from the wrath to come (Isa. xliii, 25; I Thess. i, 10) it must be because we fail to believe what He says, for joy and peace come by believing (Rom. xv, 13). If we are in Christ we cannot pray the words of lxxxv, 4-7, although as Christians we need mercy continually and salvation from the world, the flesh and the devil, while we wait for the salvation to be revealed at His appearing (verse 7; I Pet. i, 7, 13). His thoughts to His people are always thoughts of peace (Ps. xxix, 11; Jer. xxix, 11; John xiv, 27). Therefore it is well to say always, "I will hear what God the Lord will speak" (lxxxv, 8).

Lesson verse 9 reminds us that the Lord is nigh unto all who call upon Him in truth and that salvation includes all kinds of deliverances that we may need, besides the salvation of our souls now and our bodies at His coming again (Ps. cxlv, 18; lxviii, 20, R. V.). The saying that "glory may dwell in our land" we cannot appropriate, for it is wholly for Israel. The church, the believers of this age, have no land, for we are gathered out of all lands, strangers here, citizens of heaven, but we shall own the world after our marriage to the Lamb, just as Ruth came into possession of the field in which she had gleaned before her marriage to Boaz. His glory will fill us as individuals now in proportion to our yieldedness to Him, but after His glory shall be seen upon Israel it will fill the whole earth (Isa. lx, 1-3; Hab. ii, 14). The saying "Our land shall yield her increase" (lxxxv, 12) is a summary of Ps. lxvii, which tells of blessing to all the earth through Israel, but also turns us workers with God to I Cor. iii, 6, 7, where we learn that, however much we may labor, God alone can give the increase. In lesson verses 10-12 we have four great words, Mercy, Truth, Righteousness, Peace, each of which points to Him, whether for Israel or for us. He is the Truth, He is our Righteousness, He is our Peace, and in Him alone is Mercy found. All meet in Him as Son of David, Son of God. The great things which He has done and will do for His people should fill us with true laughter, and all sowing will bring good reaping if He does it through us (Ps. cxxvi.

To Improve Party-Line Service

WE suggest consideration for the persons who may be talking on your party-line. Do not interrupt their conversation. It is discourteous and unfair.

1. Answer only your own signal. If there is any confusion about the rings, report the fact promptly to the Chief Operator.
2. When you wish to call, remove the receiver and listen. If the line is in use hang up the receiver and wait until the conversation is finished.
3. Do not allow children or others to listen on the line when it is in use or to play with the telephone at any time.
4. Make your calls as brief as possible. Short conversations will keep the line open and make the service of most value to everyone.

"Good service * * * our true intent."

Complete Service to Ford Owners Everywhere

COURTEOUS attention to your needs wherever you may travel is something you appreciate, and being a Ford owner you can get it. You are always "among friends".

There are more than 700 Ford Dealer Service Stations throughout Canada. These are always within easy reach of Ford owners—for gasoline, oil, tires, repairs, accessories, expert advice or motor adjustments.

The cost of Ford Service is as remarkably low as the cost of the car itself. Nineteen of the most called for parts cost only $5.40. Just compare this with the cost of spare parts for other cars and you will realize the advantage of owning a Ford.

Upward of a Thousand Languages Among the Indians.

The bureau of American ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution, which conducts studies and investigations among the Indians, is constantly bombarded with requests for "the Indian word" for this and that. It may be worth while to explain to the public, therefore, that there is no one American Indian language. On the contrary there are about 1,000 languages in the two Americas, and practically 500 distinct Indian languages north of Mexico. It becomes, then, impossible to give "the" Indian word for any English equivalent, and consequently it is usually chosen from the language of the tribe which inhabits, or once inhabited, the particular section of the country from which the request comes; for example, the word may be chosen from the Sioux, Delaware, Cherokee, Seneca, Zuni, or other language.

One of the exhibits of the bureau of American ethnology at the recent Panama-Pacific exposition at San Francisco was a large placard, in tabular form, intended to illustrate the number and variety of Indian languages north of Mexico. Although not exhaustive, it included 33 family groups and 167 different tribes. The equivalent of only one word was shown, the concept expressed by Latin homo, "human being." For example, a member of the Cherokee tribe says "yunwi," while his former neighbor of the Creek tribe, says "isti." The Delaware of the Algonquin says "in," for a male person, and "lenao" or "lenape" for a human being. The eastern and central Eskimo use the word "inuit," meaning people, or "inuk," person, whereas his not far distant relative the Aleut, says "aliwut." The Zuni Indian expresses the word by "kwe," and the Osage by "nikashiga." These few examples show in how many ways, all different, this one idea is expressed. In fact, the Indian languages are so numerous and so difficult to record that the American Anthropological association appointed a committee some time ago to devise a standard method for transcribing them. Its report has just been published by the Smithsonian Institution and is entitled "Phonetic Transcription of Indian Languages." [illegible] into detail as to the best and [illegible] improved manner of recording [illegible] Indian languages of this [illegible] in a form that is feasible [illegible]ly understood. The report [illegible]ed primarily for philologists [illegible]nts of phonetics, and is de[illegible] show what is necessary to [illegible] record an Indian language [illegible]

[illegible]ately for the student of In[illegible]guistics, nearly all the tribal a[illegible]ily languages may be classi[illegible] groups, so that it is not ne[illegible] for the philologists to learn each [illegible]nguage; he studies the basic principles of the speech of a linguistic group, and following certain rules and exceptions is able to comprehend much of the speech of its several branches. He knows, according to Grimm's law evolved years ago by our old friend, the compiler of the fairy tales, that certain consonants correspond in all related languages, as for example, in German, the high German "das" becomes "dat" in low German; the s changing to t. The consonants l, n, and r are also readily interchangeable. Thus the scientist recognizes the same word despite its disguises. But it is not with a view of disguising or making his speech distinctive that an Indian of one tribe pronounces a word differently from one of another tribe, but because he cannot pronounce certain sounds. The Arapaho, Cheyenne, and Caddo tribes have the sound of n but lack l and r; on the other hand the Kiowa, Apache, Zuni, and Cherokee have l and n, but lack r. The [illegible]oux call themselves by a name [illegible]ing "allies," pronounced "Da[illegible] those of the eastern or San[illegible]on; "Nakota" by the middle [illegible] division, and "Lakota" [illegible]ern or Teton division; the [illegible]sion comprises all the [illegible] of Missouri or about [illegible] of the whole nation. This [illegible]ows the three methods of [illegible] one word by the members [illegible]e family.

[illegible]esides these variances and [illegible]hers there are the eccentrici[illegible] speech of the individual, of [illegible] family proper, and of the camp [illegible]oup, all of which intrude transient [illegible]rms, just as in the English speech [illegible] North America we find variations [illegible]ween the speech of a northerner, [illegible]esterner, and a southerner. The [illegible]ologist has to beware all this, [illegible]d to sift and sort the languages to [illegible]liminate all such local and colloquial accents, for it must be remembered that the speech of the red man [illegible] not a written language with a [illegible]rammar and a dictionary, except [illegible]ose which his white friends have [illegible]volved for him. It is of interest and [illegible]alue to know and record these various aboriginal languages before they [illegible]ecome extinct, and that is one part of the work of the bureau of American ethnology. In order to meet the popular demand for Indian names for postoffices, parks, villa sites, and outing organizations the bureau has lately compiled and issued a circular, giving simplified forms in Osage, Blackfoot, Delaware, Cheyenne, Cherokee, Seneca, Chippewa, and other Indian languages. Some of these names are especially interesting and musical in sound.

Winnipeg Parks.

According to the annual report of the Public Parks Board, Winnipeg has park properties to the extent of 673 acres, which cost for the land $534,154. This area is divided into twenty-one parks, and a large square of four acres. Included in one of the parks is a zoo, which must be paradise for the kiddies. The park's board also control the cemetery, which shows a surplus.

The French Population.

According to the census of 1911, 28.51 per cent. of the entire population of Canada was of French origin.

CANADA

Military Service Act, 1917

Explanatory Announcement by the Minister of Justice

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT has received the assent of the Governor-General and is now part of the law of the land. It will be enforced accordingly, and the patriotism and good sense of the people can be relied upon to support it. Resistance to its enforcement, however by word or act must and will be repressed, as resistance to any other law in force must be.

Reinforcements under the Military Service Act immediately required

It is the intention of the Government immediately to exercise the power which the Act confers and to call out men for military service in order to provide reinforcements for the Canadian forces. This is necessary since the military authorities report that the reserves available or in sight for reinforcement will shortly be exhausted unless this step be taken.

First call limited to men between 20 and 34 who were unmarried or widowers without children on July 6, 1917

The present call will be limited to men not in the schedule of exceptions who were unmarried or widowers without children on 6th July, 1917; are at least twenty years of age, and were born on or since January 1st, 1883. Of this Class all those will be entitled to conditional exemption whose services in their present occupations, agricultural, industrial or other, are essential in the national interest, and whose business or domestic responsibilities are such that serious hardship would ensue if their services be required. Conscientious scruples based upon a prohibition of combatant service by the articles of faith of the religious denomination to which men belong will also be respected. The men first required to serve will consequently be those who can be called upon with the least disturbance of the economic and social life of the country.

Civil Tribunals to deal with exemptions

Questions of exemption will be determined, not by the military authorities or by the Government, but by civil tribunals composed of representative men who are familiar with local conditions in the communities in which they serve, who will generally have personal knowledge of the economic and family reasons which those whose cases come before them have had for not volunteering their services and who will be able sympathetically to estimate the weight and importance of such reasons. Provincial Appellate Tribunals constituted from the existing judiciary of the respective provinces will be provided to correct mistakes made by Local Tribunals, and a Central Appeal Tribunal for the whole of Canada, selected from among the present Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, will be constituted in order that identical principles may be applied throughout the country. In this way every man may rest assured of the fair and full consideration of his circumstances and the national requirements both civil and military.

Proclamation will announce the day

A proclamation will issue calling out the bachelors and widowers referred to and fixing a day on or before which every man must report for service to the military authorities unless he has before that day made an application for exemption.

How to apply for exemption

Applications for exemption may be made by written notice on forms which will be available at every post office, and will be transmitted free of postage. They will not, however, be required to be made in this way, but may be presented by the applicants in person to the exemption tribunals. The cases of those who have given written notice in advance will take precedence, and appearance in person will therefore be likely to involve considerably more inconvenience and delay to the men concerned, so that it is recommended that advantage be generally taken of the facilities for written application.

Ottawa, September 11, 1917.

Exemption Tribunals in all parts of Canada

The local exemption tribunals will be constituted with the least delay possible, consistent with the selection of representative individuals to compose them, and the instruction of the members in their duties. There will be more than one thousand of such tribunals throughout Canada, each consisting of two members, one of whom will be nominated by a Joint Committee of Parliament; and the other by one of the Judges of the existing Courts. Every effort will be made by the wide distribution of tribunals, and by provision where necessary for their sitting in more than one place, to minimize the inconvenience to which men will be put in obtaining the disposition of their cases.

A Registrar will be appointed in each Province, who will be named in the proclamation and to whom enquiries may be addressed. Each Provincial Registrar will transmit to the appropriate tribunal the applications for exemption which have been submitted in advance of the sittings, and men who have sent these in will not be required to attend the tribunals until notified to do so. Other applicants should attend personally on the tribunal without notice.

How to report for service

Men who do not desire to claim exemption will report to the military authorities for service either by mail or in person at any time after the issue of the proclamation. Forms of report by mail will be found in all post offices, and, like applications for exemption, will be transmitted free of postage.

Early report advantageous

No man who reports for service will, although he may be medically examined and passed as fit, be required to go into camp or join a battalion until after a day fixed by the proclamation sufficiently late to permit of the disposition by the local tribunals of most, if not all, of the applications for exemption which may come before them. Thus no advantage will be gained by delaying or disadvantage incurred by prompt report for service on the part of those who do not intend to apply for exemption.

Facilities for immediate medical examination

Immediately upon the issue of the proclamation, medical boards will sit at every mobilization centre for the examination of men who report for service or who, subject to their right within the time limited to apply for exemption, desire to have their physical fitness determined in order to allay any doubt as to their physical condition, or to know definitely and in advance whether there is a possibility of their services being required. Certificates of physical unfitness issued by these Medical Boards will be accepted without any further investigation by exemption tribunals when they sit. Men found physically fit who have not reported for service may nevertheless apply for exemption on any of the prescribed grounds, including even their physical condition if dissatisfied with the Medical Board's conclusion.

Notice to join the colors

As reinforcements are required, notice to report to the nearest mobilization centre will be given from time to time to the men found liable and passed as fit for service. Disobedience of such notice will render the offender liable to punishment, but punishment for failure to report for military service, or to report subsequently for duty when called upon, will be imposed ordinarily by the civil magistrates; offenders, however, will remain liable for the performance of their military duties notwithstanding any civil punishment which may be imposed and will be liable to military punishment in cases in which civil proceedings are not taken.

Watch for the Proclamation

Notice of the day appointed for the making of a claim for exemption or for report for military service will be published as widely as possible; but, as no personal notice can be given until the individuals called out have so reported themselves or claimed exemption, men possibly concerned are warned to inform themselves with regard to the day fixed, since neglect may involve the loss by them of important privileges and rights.

GOLD

to divide the profits. I didn't know anybody, but after awhile I decided that the best chance was to get some advice from an honest and disinterested man. So I asked the first man I met who ran the biggest gambling place in town. He told me Jim Recket."

"Jim Recket?" I echoed. "He's the man I was to leave change for my gold slug with."

"Recket keeps the El Dorado, next door in the tent. He impressed me as a very quiet, direct, square sort of a fellow. The best type of professional gambler in matters of this sort generally is.

"'I am looking for a man,' said I, 'who has a little idle money, some time, no gold mining fever, plenty of nerve and a broad mind. Can you tell me who he is?'

"He thought a minute and then answered direct, as I knew he would.

"'Sam Brannan,' he said.

"'Tell me about him.'

"'To take up your points,' said Recket, checking off his fingers, 'he came out with a shipload of Mormons as their head, and he collected tithes from them for over a year. That's your idle money. He has all the time the Lord stuck into one day at a clip. That's your "some time." He has been here in the city since '48, which would seem to show he doesn't care much for mining. He collected the tithes from those Mormons and sent word to Brigham Young that if he wanted the money to come and get it. That's for your nerve. As for being broad minded—well, when a delegation of the Mormons, all ready for a scrap, came to him solemnly to say that they were going to refuse to pay him the tithes any more, even if he was the California head of the church, he laughed them off the place for having been so green as to pay them as long as they had.'

"I found Sam Brannan finally at the bar in Dennison's Exchange."

"What was he like?" asked Johnny eagerly. "I'll bet I heard his name fifty times today."

"He is a thickset, jolly looking, curly headed fellow, with a thick neck, a bulldog jaw and a big voice," replied Talbot. "Of course he tried to bully me, but when that didn't work he came down to business. We entered into an agreement.

"Brannan was to furnish the money and take half the profits, provided he liked the idea. When we had settled it all I told him my scheme. He thought it over awhile and came in. Then we rowed off and paid the captains of the ships. It was necessary now to get them warped in at high tide, of course, but Sam Brannan said he'd see to that. He has some sort of a pull with the natives, enough to get a day's labor, anyway."

"Warp them in?" I echoed.

"Certainly. You couldn't expect the merchants to lighter their stuff off in boats always. We'll beach these ships at high tide and then run some sort of light causeway out to them. There's no surf, and the bottom is soft. It'll cost us something, of course, but Sam and I figure we ought to divide three thousand clear."

"I'd like to ask a question or so," said I. "What's to prevent the merchants doing this same hiring of ships for themselves?"

"Nothing," said Talbot, "after the first month."

"And what prevented Brannan, after he had heard your scheme, from going out on his own hook and pocketing all the proceeds?"

"You don't understand, Frank," said Talbot impatiently. "Men of our stamp don't do those things."

"Oh!" said I.

"This," said Johnny, "made it about 2 o'clock, as I figure your story. Did you then take a needed rest?"

"Quarter of 2," corrected Talbot. "I was going back to the hotel when I passed that brick building—you know, on Montgomery street. I remembered then that lawyer and his $250 for a hole in the ground. It seemed to me there was a terrible waste somewhere. Here was a big brick building filled up with nothing but goods. It might much better be filled with people. There is plenty of room for goods in those ships, but you can't very well put people on the ships. So I just dropped in to see them about it. I offered to hire the entire upper part of the building and pointed out that the lower part was all they could possibly use as a store. They said they needed the upper part as storehouse. I offered to store the goods in an accessible safe place. Of course they wanted to see the place, but I wouldn't let on, naturally, but left it subject to their approval after the lease was signed. The joke of it is they were way overstocked anyway. Finally I made my grand offer.

"'Look here,' said I, 'you rent me that upper story for a decent length of time—say a year—and I'll buy out the surplus stock you've got up there at a decent valuation.' They jumped at that. Of course they pretended not to, but just the same they jumped. I'll either sell the stuff by auction, even at a slight loss, or else I'll stick it aboard a ship. Depends a good deal on what is there, of course. It's mostly bale and box goods of some sort or another. I've got an inventory in my pocket. Haven't looked at it yet. Then I'll partition off that wareroom and rent it out for offices and so forth. There are a lot of lawyers and things in this town just honing for something dignified and stable. I only pay three thousand a month for it."

Johnny groaned deeply.

"Well," persisted Talbot, "I figure on getting at least eight thousand a month out of it. That'll take care of a little loss on the goods, if necessary. I'm not sure a loss is necessary."

"And how much, about, are the goods?" I inquired softly.

"Oh I don't know! Somewhere between ten and twenty thousand, I suppose."

"Paid for how and when?"

"One-third cash and the rest in notes. The interest out here is rather high," said Talbot regretfully.

"Where do you expect to get the money?" I insisted.

"Oh, money, money!" cried Talbot, throwing out his arms with a gesture of impatience. "The place is full of money. It's pouring in from the mines, from the world outside. Money's no trouble!"

He fell into an intent reverie, biting at his short mustache. I arose softly to my feet.

"Johnny," said I in a strangled little voice, "I've got to give back McGlynn's change. Want to go with me?"

We tiptoed around the corner of the building and fell into each other's arms with shrieks of joy.

"Oh," cried Johnny at last, wiping the tears from his eyes, "money's no trouble!"

After we had to some extent relieved our feelings we changed my gold slug into dust—I purchased a buckskin bag—and went to find McGlynn. Our way to his quarters led past the postoffice, where a long cue of men still waited patiently and quietly in line. We stood for a few moments watching the demeanor of those who had received their mail or who had been told there was nothing for them. Some of the latter were pathetic and looked fairly dazed with grief and disappointment.

We found Yank and Talbot still at the edge of the hotel veranda.

"Look here, Tal," said Johnny at once, "how are you going to finish all this business you've scared up and get off to the mines within a reasonable time? We ought to start pretty soon."

"Mines?" echoed Talbot. "I'm not going to the mines! I wouldn't leave all this for a million mines. No; Yank and I have been talking it over. You boys will have to attend to the mining end of this business. I'll pay Frank's share and take a quarter of the profits, and Frank can pay me in addition half his profits. In return for the work I don't do I'll put aside $250 and use it in my business here, and all of us will share in the profits I make from that amount. How does that strike you?"

"I don't like to lose you out of this," said Johnny disappointedly.

"Nor I," said I.

"And I hate to lose the adventure, boys," agreed Talbot earnestly. "But, honestly, I can't leave this place now even if I want to, and I certainly don't want to."

I turned in that night with the feeling that I had passed a very interesting day.

CHAPTER XI.

Off For Sutter's Fort.

TWO days later Yank, Johnny and I embarked aboard a small bluff bowed sailboat, waved our farewells to Talbot, standing on the shore, and laid our course to cross the blue bay behind an island called Alcatraz. Our boatman was a short, swarthy man with curly hair and gold rings in his ears. He handled his boat well, but spoke not at all. After a dozen attempts to get something more than monosyllables out of him we gave it up and settled ourselves to the solid enjoyment of a new adventure.

The breeze was strong and drove even our rather clumsy craft at considerable speed. The blue waters of the bay flashed in the sun and riffled under the squalls. Spray dashed away from our bows. A chill racer in from the open Pacific, diluting the sunlight.

After a journey of several days we came into a wide bottom land country with oaks. The distant blue hills had grown and had become slate gray. At noon we discerned ahead of us a low bluff, and a fork in the river, and among the oak trees the gleam of tents, and before them a tracery of masts where the boats and small ships lay moored to the trees. This was the embarcadero of Sutter's Fort beyond, or the new city of Sacramento, whichever you pleased. Here our boat journey ended, and we set out to cover the three or four miles to Sutter's Fort.

Sutter's Fort was situated at the edge of the live oak park. We found it to resemble a real fort, with high walls, bastions and a single gate at each end through which one entered to a large inclosed square, perhaps a hundred and fifty yards long by fifty wide. The walls were not pierced for guns, and the defense seemed to depend entirely on the jutting bastions. The walls were double and about twenty-five feet apart. Thus by roofing over this space and dividing it with partitions Sutter had made up his barracks, blacksmith shop, bakery, and the like. Later in our investigations we even ran acro[illegible] a woolen factory, a distillery, a [illegible] billiard room and a bowling alley. At the southern end of this long [illegible] stood a two story house. Directly opposite the two story [illegible] and [illegible] the other end of the inclosure w[illegible] an adobe corral.

The place was crowded with people. A hundred or so miners rushed here and there on apparently very important business or loafed contentedly against the posts or the sun warmth of adobe walls. In this latter occupation they were aided and abetted by a number of the native Californians. Perhaps a hundred Indians were leading horses, carrying burdens or engaged in some other heavy toil. They were the first we had seen, and we examined them with considerable curiosity. A good many of them were nearly naked, but some had on portions of battered civilized apparel. Very few could make up a full suit of clothes, but contented themselves with either a coat, or a shirt, or a pair of pantaloons, or even with only a hat, as the case might be. They were very swarthy, squat, villainous looking savages, with big heads, low foreheads, coarse hair and beady little eyes.

We stopped for some time near the sentry box at the entrance, accustoming ourselves to the whirl and movement. Then we set out to find McClellan. He was almost immediately pointed out to us, a short, square, businesslike man, with a hard gray face, dealing competently with the pressure. A score of men surrounded him, each eager for his attention. While we hovered, awaiting our chance, two men walked in through the gate. They were accorded the compliment of almost a complete silence on the part of those who caught sight of them.

The first was a Californian about thirty-five or forty years of age, a man of lofty, stern bearing, swarthy skin, glossy side whiskers and bright supercilious eyes. He wore a light blue short jacket trimmed with scarlet and with silver buttons, a striped silk sash, breeches of crimson velvet, met below by long embroidered deerskin boots. A black kerchief was bound crosswise on his head, entirely concealing the hair, and a flat crowned, wide, gray hat heavily ornamented with silver completed this gorgeous costume. He moved with the assured air of the aristocrat. The splendor of his apparel, the beauty of his face and figure and the grace of his movements attracted the first glance from all eyes. Then immediately he was passed over in favor of his companion.

The latter was a shorter, heavier man, of more mature years. In fact, his side whiskers were beginning to turn gray. His costume was plain, but exquisitely neat, and a strange blend of the civil and the military. The jacket, for example, had been cut in the trim military fashion, but was worn open to exhibit the snowy cascade of the linen beneath. But nobody paid much attention to the man's dress. The dignity and assured calm of his face and eye at once impressed one with conviction of unusual quality.

Johnny stared for a moment, his brows knit; then, with an exclamation, he sprang forward.

"Captain Sutter!" he cried.

Sutter turned slowly to look Johnny squarely in the face, his attitude one of cold but courteous inquiry. Johnny was approaching hat in hand. I confess he astonished me. We had known him intimately for some months and always as the harum-scarum, impulsive, hail fellow, bubbling, irresponsible. Now a new Johnny stepped forward, quiet, highbred, courteous, self contained. Before he had spoken a word Captain Sutter's aloof expression had relaxed.

"I beg your pardon for addressing you so abruptly," Johnny was saying. "The surprise of the moment must excuse me. Ten years ago, sir, I had the pleasure of meeting you at the time you visited my father in Virginia."

"My dear boy!" cried Sutter. "You are of course the son of Colonel Fairfax. But ten years ago you were a very young man."

"A small boy, rather," laughed Johnny.

They chatted for a few moments, exchanging news, I suppose, though they had drawn beyond our earshot. In a few moments we were summoned and presented, first to Colonel Sutter, then to Don Gaspar Martinez. The latter talked English well. Yank and I, both somewhat silent and embarrassed before all this splendor of manner, trailed the triumphal progress like two small boys. We were glad to trail, however. Captain Sutter took us about, showing us in turn all the many industries of the place.

Don Gaspar here excused himself on the ground of business, promising to rejoin us later.

We walked back through the inclosure. Our companion was greeted on all sides with the greatest respect and affection. To all he responded with benign but unapproachable dignity. From the vociferating group he called the trader McClellan, to whom he introduced us, all three, with urbane formality.

"These young men," he told McClellan, who listened to him latently, his brows knit, "are more than acquaintances; they are very especial friends of mine. I wish to bespeak your good offices for what they may require. They are on their way to the mines. And now, gentlemen, I repeat, I am delighted to have had this opportunity. I wish you the best of luck, and I sincerely hope you may be able to visit me at Feather River, where you are always sure of a hearty welcome. Treat them well, McClellan."

"You know, cap'n, friends of your'n are friends of mine," said McClellan briefly.

At the end of half an hour we found ourselves in possession of two pack horses and saddles and a load of provisions.

"Look out for hoss thieves," advised McClellan. "These yere Greasers will follow you for days, waitin' for a chance to git your stock. Don't picket with rawhide rope, or the coyotes are likely to gnaw yore animiles loose. Better buy a couple of ha'r ropes from the nearest Mex. Take care of yoreselves. Goodby." He was immediately immersed in his flood of business.

We loaded our pack horses and set off next morning early on the trail up the American river. At last, it seemed to us, we were really under way; as though our long journeyings and many experiences had been but a preparation for this start. Our spirits were high, and we laughed and joked and sang extravagantly. Even Yank woke up and acted like a frisky colt. Such early wayfarers as we met we hailed with shouts and chaffing; nor were we in the least abashed by an occasional surly response, or the not infrequent attempts to discourage our hopes. For when one man said there was no gold another was confident that the diggings were not even scratched.

Yank turned the two horses out into a grass meadow and sat, his back against an oak tree, smoking his pipe and watching them. Johnny and I unrolled the beds, sorted out the simple cooking utensils, and started to cook. Occasional travelers on the road just above us shouted out friendly greetings. They were a miscellaneous lot. Most were headed toward the mountains. These journeyed in various ways. Some walked afoot and unencumbered, some carried apparently all their belongings on their backs; one outfit comprising three men had three saddle horses and four packs—a princely caravan.

Near sundown two horsemen turned off the trail and rode down to our little trickle of water. When they drew near we recognized in one of them Don Gaspar Martinez. He wore still his gorgeous apparel of the day before, with only the addition of a pair of heavy silver ornamented spurs on his heels and a brace of pistols in his sash. His horse, a magnificent chestnut, was harnessed in equal gorgeousness, with silvered broad bit, silver chains jangling therefrom, a plaited rawhide bridle and reins, a carved leather, high pommelled saddle, also silver ornamented, and a bright colored, woven saddle blanket beneath. The animal stepped daintily and proudly, lifting his little feet and planting them among the stones as though fastidiously. The man who rode with Don Gaspar was evidently of a lower class. He was, however, a straight, handsome young fellow enough, with a dark clear complexion, a small mustache and a pleasant smile. His dress and accoutrements were on the same general order as those of Don Gaspar, but of quieter color and more serviceable material. His horse, however, was of the same high bred type. A third animal followed, unled, packed with two cowhide boxes.

The Spaniard rode up to us and saluted courteously; then his eye lit with recognition.

"Ah," said he, "the good friends of our Captain Sutter! This is to be well met. If it is not too much I would beg the favor of to camp."

"By all means, Don Gaspar," said Johnny, rising. "The pleasure is, of course, our own."

Again saluting us, Don Gaspar and his companion withdrew a short distance up the little meadow. There the Spaniard sat down beneath a bush and proceeded to smoke a cigarette, while his companion unsaddled the horses, turned them loose to graze, stacked up their saddles and made simple camping arrangements.

"Old Plush Pants doesn't intend to do any work if he catches sight of it first," observed Johnny.

"Probably the other man is a servant?" I suggested.

"More likely a sort of dependent," amended Johnny. "They run a kind of patriarchal establishment, I've been told."

"Don't use them big words, Johnny," complained Yank, coming up with the horses.

"I meant they make the poor relations and kid brothers do the hustling," said Johnny.

"Now I understand you," said Yank. "I wish I could see what they do with their homes nights. I bet they know how. And if I was a hoss thief I'd surely take a long chance for that chestnut gelding."

"You might wander over later and find out," I suggested.

"And get my system full of lead—sure," said Yank.

The two camps did not exchange visits. We caught the flicker of their little fire, but we were really too tired to be curious, and we turned in early, our two animals tied fast to small trees at our feet.

The next day lifted us into the mountains. Big green peaks, across which hung a bluish haze, showed themselves between the hills. The latter were more precipitous, and the brush had now given way to pines of better size and quality than those seen lower down.

CHAPTER XII.

The Gold Trail.

WE came upon the diggings quite suddenly. The trail ran around the corner of a hill, and there they were below us! In the wide, dry stream bottom perhaps fifty men were working busily, like a lot of ants. Some were picking away at the surface of the ground; others had dug themselves down waist deep and stooped and rose like legless bodies. Others had disappeared below ground and showed occasionally only as hovel blades. From so far above the scene was very lively and animated, as each was working like a beaver and the red shirts made gay little sots of color. On the hillside clung a few white tents and log cabins, but the main town itself we later discovered as well as the larger diggings, lay around the bend and upstream.

We looked all about us for some path leading down to the river, but could find none. So perforce we had to continue on along the trail. Thus we entered the camp of Hangman's Gulch, for if it had been otherwise I am sure we would have located promptly where we had seen those red shirted men.

We wandered about here and there, looking with all our eyes. The miners were very busy and silent, but quite friendly, and allowed us to examine as much as we pleased the results of their operations. In the pits and cradles the yellow flake gold glistered plainly, contrasting with the black sand. In the pans, however, the residue spread out fan shaped along the angle between the bottom and the side, and at the apex the gold lay heavy and beautiful all by itself. The men were generally bearded, tanned with working in this blinding sun and plastered liberally with the red earth. We saw some queer sights, however, as when we came across a jolly pair dressed in what were the remains of ultra fashionable garments up to and including plug hats! At one side, working some distance from the stream, were small groups of native Californians or Mexicans. They did not trouble to carry the earth all the way to the river, but, after screening it roughly, tossed it into the air above a canvas, thus winnowing out the heavier pay dirt. I thought this must be very disagreeable.

"Where can we dig a little of this gold ourselves?"

As we wandered about here and there among all these men so busily engaged and with our own eyes saw pan after pan show gold, actual metallic guaranteed gold, such as rings and watches and money are made of, a growing excitement possessed us—the excitement of a small boy with a new and untried gun. We wanted to get at it ourselves. Only we did not know how.

Finally Yank approached one of the busy miners.

"Stranger," said he, "we're new to this. Maybe you can tell us where we can dig a little of this gold ourselves."

The man straightened his back to exhibit a roving humorous blue eye, with which he examined Yank from top to toe.

"If," said he, "it wasn't for that eighteen foot cannon you carry over your left arm and a cold gray pair of eyes you carry in your head I'd direct you up the sidehill yonder and watch you sweat. As it is, you can work anywhere anybody else isn't working. Start in!"

"Can we dig right next to you, then?" asked Yank, nodding at an unbroken piece of ground just upstream.

The miner clambered carefully out of his waist deep trench, searched his pockets, produced a pipe and tobacco. After lighting this he made Yank a low bow.

"Thanks for the compliment; but, I warn you, this claim of mine is not very rich. I'm thinking of trying somewhere else."

"Don't you get any gold?"

"Oh, a few ounces a day."

"That suits me for a beginning," said Yank decidedly. "Come on, boys!"

The miner hopped back into his hole, only to stick his head out again for the purpose of telling us:

"Mind you keep fifteen feet away!"

With eager hands we slipped a pick and shovels from beneath the pack ropes, undid our iron bucket and without further delay commenced feverishly to dig.

Johnny held the pail, while Yank and I vied with each other in being the first to get our shovelfuls into that receptacle. As a consequence we nearly swamped the pail first off and had to pour some of the earth out again. Then we all three ran down to the river and took turns stirring that mud pie beneath the gently flowing waters in the manner of the "pot panners" we had first watched. After a good deal of trouble we found ourselves possessed of a thick layer of rocks and coarse pebbles.

"We forgot to screen it," I pointed out.

"We haven't any screen," said Johnny.

"Let's pick 'em out by hand," suggested Yank.

We did so. The process emptied the pail. Each of us insisted on examining closely, but none of us succeeded in creating out of our desires any of that alluring black sand.

"I suppose we can't expect to get color every time," observed Johnny disappointedly. "Let's try her again."

We tried her again, and yet again and then some more, but always with the same result. Our hands became puffed and wrinkled with constant immersion in the water and began to feel sore from the continual stirring of the rubble.

"Something wrong," grunted Johnny, into the abysmal silence in which we had been carrying on our work.

"We can't expect it every time," I reminded him.

"All the others seem to."

"Well, maybe we've struck a blank place. Let's try somewhere else," suggested Yank.

Johnny went over to speak to o[ur] neighbor, who was engaged in toss[ing] out shovelfuls of earth from an ex[ca]vation into which he had nearly d[is]appeared. At Johnny's hail he straig[ht]ened his back, so that his head bobb[ed] out of the hole like a prairie dog.

"No, it doesn't matter where y[ou] dig," he answered Johnny's questio[n]. "The pay dirt is everywhere."

So we moved on a few hundred feet, picked another unoccupied patch and resumed our efforts. No greater su[c]cess rewarded us here.

"I believe maybe we ought to [illegible] deeper," surmised Yank.

"Some of these fellows are takin[g] their dirt right off top of the groun[d]," objected Johnny.

From announcements appearing in various local papers it looks as if many merchants are beginning to realize the folly of the credit system with its attendant abuses and losses. It is only a matter of a short time when all business men will have to follow suit.

Father Cadot, of Cape Croker Indian Reserve, had the misfortune to have his new Ford car badly wrecked a few days ago, a few miles north of Colpoys. For some reason the car became unmanagable when running at a high rate of speed. It left the road and ran over some rocks, throwing the occupants out. They escaped with some bruises, but the car was badly wrecked.

Reeve Dan MacDonald, of Kinloss, has not heard from his son, William, for about three months. He enlisted last spring for service with the British Navy and when last heard from he was engaged in mine sweeping about the south of England. The Admiralty appears to still regard him as on active service, but the sudden cessation of his correspondence, which up to three months ago was regular, is causing apprehension.—Lucknow Sentinel.

The Annual Rural School Fair was held in the grounds of S. S. No. 11 Brant on Monday, Sept. 24th. A large number of school children were present and the exhibits were numerous. A feature of the events was a teachers' race in which keen rivalry was shown. Two addresses on the war were delivered by pupils from Malcolm school and showed great preparation on the part of the students. The Fair ended about five o'clock and a joyful crowd wended their way home.

Rev. H. B. Storey of Cargill preached admirable and scholarly sermons in the Methodist church here last Sunday. He clothed his gospel message in beautiful and effective rhetoric and utilized current events for purposes of illustration. In our opinion a preacher makes more headway to-day when he uses modern methods. In religion as in everything else, one is inclined to become prosy, and the average audience needs to be made "sit up." A speaker gains the interest of his audience and gets better results when he tells his story in a language they understand.—Hanover Post.

Suspicious Liquor Shipments

License Inspector J. M. White of Walkerton is looking into the matter of a number of shipments of liquor coming here addressed to one man. The peculiar thing about it all is that the consignee is almost a teetotaler. The Inspector paid a visit to his residence in Carrick and found no liquor on the premises and he denied that he had ever received a shipment of liquor. It begins to look as though other parties had sent for liquor in his name, and an investigation will probably be made into the matter.—Mildmay Gazette.

Bellback—Minorgan

A popular Brant couple, Miss Annie Minorgan, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. David Minorgan, of the 11th Con., and Mr. William Bellbeck, son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Bellbeck, of the 12th Con., were quietly married at the Manse, Chesley, on Tuesday, Sept 25th, by Rev. Mr. Hiltz, pastor of Geneva Presbyterian Church. They then motored to the home of the bride's parents, where a large company sat down to a fine wedding supper, and the evening was enjoyably spent in dancing, the best of music being provided by the Vesta Orchestra. The happy couple have the best wishes of a wide circle of friends.

An Inspiring Convention.

The District W. M. S. Convention held in the Methodist Church at Chesley on Friday proved to be most successful and inspiring. Twelve delegates from Walkerton motored over and took charge of the devotional exercises. An address by Miss Kate Morgan, who spent thirty years in Japan as a missionary, was one of the finest talks of the delegates had ever heard along missionary lines. Mrs. Dippel gave an excellent talk on the importance of missionary training for young girls. Miss Rolston of Walkerton, was re-elected District Organizer. At the conclusion of the program supper was served by the ladies of the Chesley Auxiliary and an enjoyable social hour spent.

A newspaper man could go seven days in a week, seven times a day, and ask different persons for the news and each time to be told there is absolutely nothing going on in this locality. District Convention

The District Convention of the Women's Missionary Society was held at Chesley on Friday, Sept. 28th. Miss Rolston, District Organizer occupied the chair in the afternoon, while very encouraging reports from the different auxiliaries were read, and Mrs. Dippel of Walkerton gave a very interesting and instructive talk on "The Training of Young Girls in the Home." Miss Morgan, returned missionary from Japan, gave an interesting address on the work being done there and Mrs. Dr. Scanlon of Port Elgin sang "The Ninety and Nine." Miss Rolston of Walkerton was re-elected District Organizer and Miss Weisler of Hanover Sec.-Treas. The evening meeting was presided over by the Rev. Dr. Williamson, pastor of Chesley Methodist Church. Miss Morgan again spoke on the need for workers in Japan and made a very earnest plea for volunteers for the Mission Field. The Chesley Methodist Choir rendered some very excellent music during the evening under the leadership of Mr. Sanderson. The collection for the day amounted to $13.78. The next Convention is to be held in Walkerton.

The town of Hanover figured in the daily press of Toronto and other cities last week in connection with the silly rumor that got going around here about confiscation of canned goods. Mayor Taylor wired to headquarters about the report and the rumor was contracted. They must think we're a bunch of rubes up here. The following is a sample of what appeared, taken from the Daily Star: "Because they had heard that the Food Controller had ordered the confiscation of all canned fruit and vegetables over fifty pints jars per family, the residents of Hanover have refused to do any canning under any circumstances. One of the citizens, wired Dr. A. H. Abbott, Secretary of the Organization of Resources Committee, asking for confirmation or denial of the rumor. Dr. Abbott wired back that while the order-in-council of August 24th prohibited the sale and purchase of certain canned vegetables there had never been any suggestion of confiscation, the idea being to compel the use of fresh vegetables. The regulation does not affect the use of privately canned goods." - Hanover Post

OPENING HUNTING SEASON

Forty Moose Seen in Four Days in Abitibi District of Quebec.

The crack of the hunter's rifle will soon be heard once more. The hunting season for deer, moose and caribou opens in the Province of Quebec on September 1st, except in the counties of Ottawa, Pontiac, Labelle and Temiskaming, where the open season begins October 1st. Sport will be excellent this year according to reports received at Grand Trunk Headquarters, Montreal.

Many sportsmen are planning trips to the new moose country in the Abitibi district of Northern Quebec, reached through Cochrane, the junction of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway and the Transcontinental Line.

In the hunting reserves, there known as Canuck's Camps, moose are more plentiful this year than every before. This, it is believed, is due to the natural increase and to the fact that the moose are steadily moving into this new region from the more southerly areas. One party just returned from this section sighted in four days more than forty moose. Some wonderful moving pictures of moose have just been taken there. In this Abitibi district there is also considerable bear with some deer and a few caribou.

In Ontario the hunting season opens November 1st, but an order in council has just been promulgated allowing moose hunting in that portion of Ontario lying north of the Transcontinental Line to begin October 10th., and extend to November 30th., making the season considerably longer than in former years.

The transportation authorities are co-operating in every way in the work of attracting sportsmen to Canada, and stand ready to give all available information to the intending visitor.

TEA TALK

If other Grocers bought tea in as large quantities as we do they would be able to sell you good tea as cheaply as we do but what's the use of buying big if you don't sell big, that's the way the other fellows look at the matter—and rightly so.

The tea we want you to try is the kind we are selling everyday to satisfy customers.

Is you'll take the trouble to order a pound or half a pound you'll agree that our claim is based on facts.

H. C. OF L. AT GAOL

Board Now Costs 12½ Cents A Day—Prisoners Live on Plain Food and are Said to get Fat on it.

That bogey of all householders, the H. C. of L., has even struck the Walkerton gaol, where we learn from Gaoler McKechnie's report that the cost of the prisoner's daily rations has gone up to 12½c. a day, representing an increase in two years of 1½c. Considering however that board in most country hotels is now $2 a day, the cost of keep at the Castle McKechnie is still well within bounds. The fare is still quite substantial and nourishing. Some of the prisoners get fat on it. The menu includes half a pound of bread at every meal, two or three ounces of oatmeal twice a day, meat and potatoes for dinner three times a week, with soup two other days of the week.

Other interesting items in Mr. McKechnie's report are:—No. of persons in custody during the year, 47 males, 8 females, a total of 55; prisoners under 16 years, 5, all males; first offenders 35; sentenced to the penetentiary 1; sentenced to the Boys' Industrial School 2; Canadians 43, English 2, Irish 2, other countries 8; Roman Catholics 16, Church [illegible] England 5, Presbyterians 8, Methodists 14, other denominations 12; married 22, single 33; unable to read or write 6. The offences for which prisoners were committed to gaol during the past year are:—Arson, assault, bigamy, conspiracy, contempt of court, destroying property, giving liquor to Indians, perjury, rape, theft.

A demonstration of the Staude Mak-a-tractor, hauling a two-harrow plow, will be given at Leonard Long's farm, lot 16, con. 1, Brant, Monday afternoon [illegible] 15th at 1.30 o'clock, by the district agents, Sparrow and Fraser of Paisley.

OLD GREENOCK RESIDENT

Andrew Freiberger Passed Away on Sunday Night in His Seventy-first Year at Bruce County Hospital.

The death occurred at Bruce County Hospital, Walkerton, early Wednesday morning, October 10th, of Andrew Freiberger, a well-known and highly respected Greenock resident. Mr. Freiberger had been poorly since two and a half years ago when he underwent an operation for a serious internal complaint. Last week he underwent a second operation, following which his condition became gradually worse. Mr. Freiberger had a fine constitution and put up a plucky fight against his ailment. Right up to the last his cheery nature did not desert him and he was never heard to complain. Mr. Freiberger was born in Waterloo County 71 years ago, his father being the late Sigmund Freiberger. At the age of 22 he came to Culross and two years later was married to Miss Annie Sadlo of Riversdale, who along with a large family survives him. Mr. Freiburger was highly respected throughout the neighborhood. He possessed a spirit of genialty that was infectious and made him a favorite everywhere. He had a keen sense of humor and the love for a joke which seemed to make his years sit lightly on his shoulders. In his death the family have the deep sympathy of the entire community. Besides his widow, he is mourned by five sons and five daughters:—Mrs. John Forsythe of Greenock, Mrs. Wm. Goode of New Ontario, Mrs. Jos. Schumacher of Stavely, Alta., Mrs. Wm. Bannerman of Culross, Joseph of Greenock, Sigmund of Culross, Andrew of Greenock, Philip of Culross, Jacob of the West, Mrs. Andrew Caskanette of Greenock. Mr. Joseph Freiberger of Walkerton is a brother. The funeral will be held on Friday morning. Service at Chepstow R. C. Church at 9.30.

Miss Ella Hyslop of Guelph spent the holiday with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Hyslop.

Mrs. Will Patterson has been very ill as the result of stepping on a rusty nail a week ago Tuesday.

Bob MacGregor and Jim McKinnon of the 64th Battery are home from Guelph on a week's leave.

Mrs. Hugill and her sister, Miss McKenzie of Toronto, were Thanksgiving visitors at Mr. E Myles'.

Some choice bargains are offered shoppers in the merchants' advertisements in this week's paper.

Mr. Mac Graham has severed his connection with Pletsch Bros. and has secured a position at Lindsay.

The Lutheran congregation has a minister in view for the pastorate here and may arrange to extend a formal call next Sunday.

Rev. H. B. Storey will preach in the Methodist Church Sunday. Subjects;—morning— "Life's Vigilant Angel—Fear" Evening—"God, the Invisible King."

Mr. and Mrs. Bert Rudolph who have been visiting the former's parents Mr. and Mrs. Henry Rudolph and sister Mrs. Wm. Bush motored back to Detroit Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. Bert Rudolph, Mrs. Wm. Bush and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Rudolph were away for a few days last week on a motor trip visiting relatives in Hanover, Elmwood, Tara and Owen Sound.

Mr. E. G. Powell, representing the Citizens Committee of One Hundred visited Bruce County the past week. This organization is doing valuable work in backing up the enforcement of the Ontario Temperance Act.

Mrs. Lawrence Bauman and daughter, Miss Tillie, arrived home last week from an extended visit to the West, most of the time being spent with Mrs. Bauman's son, Mr. O. L. Bauman at Vibank, Sask. Crops in that section were fairly good this year but did not come up to last year's on account of the scarcity of rain.

Conscription Tribunal.

The announcement of the second members of the various Conscripton tribunals is expected in a day or so. It is unofficially reported that Mr. John Rowland may be appointed to sit with Mr. Frank Rennie, the first appointee.

Off For China

Miss Winifred Warren leaves on this afternoon's C. P. R. train en route for the Chinese Mission Field. Miss Agnes Warren and Miss Lizzie Nesbitt are accompanying her as far as Toronto. Miss Warren expects to have the company of a number of other Missionaries on the boat from Vancouver.

Died At Hospital

Mrs. Robert Kain, a respected Hanover lady, passed away at the County Hospital on Sunday night in her 47th year. Mrs Kain had been a patient for three weeks suffering from cancer of the stomach. Mr. John Kain of Walkerton is a step-son and Mrs. Thos. Cunningham of Maple Hill is a step-daughter. The funeral was held at Hanover on Wednesday afternoon.

Notice to Subscribers In Arrears

Constant increase in the cost of publishing a weekly newspaper has brought the average publisher's profit on subscriptions so close to the vanishing point that it has become more than ever necessary to insist that subscribers, to enjoy the paid-in-advance price of $1.50, pay their subscriptions strictly in advance, otherwise they are carried at a financial loss. A few subscriptions allowed to run in arrears soon amount to many hundreds of dollars and are a very poor asset when it comes to paying cash for printing inks, type, paper and other items as a publisher must do in order to buy right. We are at present engaged in clearing up our subscription books and invite the co-operation of our readers. While we are loath to take any action that would jeopardize the friendly relations between ourselves and even our tardiest subscribers, we must insist that subscribers in arrears pay up without delay. To those who do not respond to this notice, it will be necessary to charge not only the $2 a year rate but also the extra costs of collection, which will at once be added the moment we hand the accounts to our solicitors for collection which we propose to do thirty days after the first publication of this notice.

Bad Shrapnel Wound.

Pte. Art. Farrer writes home that it was shrapnel wounds, one above the knee and one below, that put him on the casualty list recently. He got a bad gash above the knee, requiring two operations. The rough trip across the Channel bothered him badly but he is now doing well in a hospital in Blighty.

G. T. R. Officials Here

The following G. T. R. Officials were here on Tuesday looking over the Company's property:—C. E. Horning, District Passenger Agent, L. L. Grabill, Gen. Baggage Agt., H. Ferguson, Supt. of Tracks, W. H. Patton, Supervisor of Signals, and E. G. Howson, Division Engineer of Toronto and R. H. Fish, District Supt., and W. Cayley, Supervisor of Buildings and Bridges, Stratford and P. Davey of Palmerston Ordered To Italy.

Leslie Heuther, a Walkerton boy who joined the Air Service of the Royal Navy, has successfully passed his final examinations and is now a Flight Lieutenant. Lieut. Heuther was for a time stationed at Ramsgate on the "reception committee" receiving the German airmen as they came across the channel in their frequent raids, but recently received orders to embark for Italy, where he will be on duty for the British Navy in the Medditerranen.

Thank-Offering Meeting

The Thankoffering meeting of the Knox Mission Band drew a large audience Tuesday night. An excellent program was given including a debate on the subject: "Resolved that medical missions have done more for modern foreign missions than educational." The affirmative was taken by Clayton Fortune and Leander Bilger, the negative by Oscar Schwindt and Leslie McConnell. The affirmative won. The Thankoffering meeting of the W. M. S. on Wednesday afternoon is being addressed by Mrs. (Rev.) Hilts of Chesley.

Square Deal For All

With the public looking in all directions for some relief from the H. C. of L. the local butchers' petition to the Town Council to make transient meat-sellers pay a license fee might not seem to touch a popular chord but at the same time we believe their demand is fair and right and the public will see the justice of it. A transient meat seller, who does business during the cold weather only, escapes all overhead expense, pays no taxes, pays nothing for the privilege of doing business in the town, as the butcher does in the shape of a business tax, not only that but the town provides for the transient free of charge a place in the market hall to do business in. This is too much of the good thing. We believe a small license fee or stall rent should be charged which would place both butchers and transients on the same footing. The transient will still be able to sell cheap, as he gets spot cash, has no delivery or other overhead expenses. And the housewife who wants to get a cheap cut in these times of economizing will still have the privilege of walking down to the market hall, paying for it and carrying it home herself.

THE TOWN COUNCIL

Had A Real Live Session—Coun. McCarter Had Herald Times Reporter Banished From Table—Reeve Russell Claims Milk Test Unfair.

The Town Council had such a volume of business to get through on Monday night, that about 10.30 o'clock they give up in despair and arrainged to hold a special meeting Thursday night to finish the job. The busiest man at the board was Finance Chairman Sam Vogan, who had the biggest bunch of accounts on record, most of them small ones, to deal with.

Times Reporter Banished.

The outstanding feature of the session was Coun. Sandy McCarter's coup in putting through a resolution banishing the Herald Times' reporter from the table. It will be recalled that on June 14th. the Times published an article headed "donkey legislation" which Coun. McCarter characterized at the next meeting as being scurrilous and insulting, and which Rev. Sanderson said was an insult to the Council. At that time Coun. McCarter tried in vain to get Mayor Johnston to take action in the matter. The sequel followed on Monday night in the form of this motion; Moved by Coun. McCarter, second by Coun. Sanderson, that the Mayor ask Arthur Wesley to vacate his chair at the Council table until he make a full retraction of the article in the Herald-Times on June 14th. under the head of "Donkey Legislation."

Coun. McCarter said that the members of the Board had a right to be protected from such scurrilous attacks, and it looked as if the representative of the Herald-Times had no sense of duty or decency.

Mayor Johnston called for the yeas and nays, and the resolution was carried on the following vote:—

Yea—Russell, McKinnon, Sanderson, McCarter—4.

Nay—Vogan, Mayor—2.

Mr. Wesley, who was present, said he wouldn't allow himself to be muzzled for the mere privilege of sitting in a chair at the table. The motion, he said, had been put through at a time when the movers knew it would carry, on account of the absence of Couns. McGregor and Truax.

Coun. Sanderson resented Mr. Wesley's last remark which he said was most unfair.

The incident closed here with "Sandy" wearing a seraphic smile and the Times man occupying a position at the rear.

Town Has No Coal.

Chief Ferguson reported that the Town Hall was about out of coal, and that there was no coal forthcoming from Alex. Ernest who had taken the contract last Spring at $8.45 a ton. The present price is $9. Town Clerk Collins was instructed to write Mr. Ernest and ask him to make good or the town will have to buy coal from Sandy George at $9 and charge the difference up to him.

Claims Test Unfair.

Reeve Russell complained of the way Chief Ferguson made the last milk test. He believed the Chief was listening to some people "around the corner" who had been planning to get him (Russell). The Reeve said he himself had several tests some time ago made of the milk he sold and found it hovered too close to the 3.0 test. He asked Mr. N. C. McKay what to do about it and Mr. McKay advised him to add cream. From that day forward, he bought cream every day from William Miehlhausen at the top of the hill and added it to the milk before coming into town. What hadn't the chief done but hired a rig and met him away out in the country, before he got his cream.

Chief Ferguson disclaimed having any sinister motives. He said he had expected to meet Mr. Russell at the East End bridge, but not meeting him he kept moving on as he had 20 other samples to gather.

Coun. McKinnon and Russell moved that in the opinion of the Council the Chief had exceeded his authority in going beyond the town limits to make milk tests and they did not approve of his action—Carried.

Reeve Russell asked if the Council would give Mr. J. J. Schumacher permission to connect up temporarily with a drain in the vicinity of his new property seeing that they would not build a sewer.

Mayor Johnston said the Council would be exceeding its authority to over-rule the Medical Health Officer in such matters. That officer, he knew, would not permit it.

Mr. J. J. Schumacher, who built a new house recently in the West Ward, asked the Council to construct a sewer

EDITORIAL COMMENT

THE Toronto Saturday Night is not at all enamored of the way in which the work of the Imperial Munitions Board in Canada is being handled. Here is what it has to say of the work done by the Board over which Sir Joseph Flavelle presides:

"We are credibly informed, and will stand corrected if misinformed, that under the old Shell Committee's regime the office was administered at an expense of 1.7 per cent, on the turnover of $75,000,000 of shells, whereas the Imperial Munitions Board on a turnover of $550,000,000 of munitions have expended over 5 per cent. We do know, however, that in one building alone in Ottawa there have been employed by the Imperial Munitions Board no less than 800 clerks, and that there is a total staff of some 1,200. We also know that the methods pursued in whirling forgings from one end of the country and back again has been wasteful to a criminal extent. These forgings have journeyed in the process of shell making from Hamilton to St. John, N. B., there to be machined, and on the other hand other forgings have taken a railway journey from St. John to Hamilton, there in turn to be machined. Ontario makers of shell boxes have shipped their boxes to Quebec, and Quebec shell box makers have shipped their boxes to Ontario. Altogether a more scandalous waste of money for freights alone has never been witnessed in this country."

SPEAKING at the Public Health Association at Ottawa, Dr. C. J. Hastings, the well-known Medical Health Officer of Toronto, gave expression to some notable utterances regarding the unequal distribution of wealth. Dr. Hastings stated that there were 999 new millionaires and multimillionaires in the United States and Canada since the beginning of the war. The speaker stated that this was sufficient to make him thoroughly agree with and echo the sentiments of Sir Joseph Flavelle, when he said "To hell with the profiteers." Continuing, Dr. Hastings gave some interesting figures regarding the proportion of poverty in England, and stated that in the United States there were 10,000,000 cases of constant poverty. The very wealthy were the lowest form of so-called aristocracy, and the unequal distribution of wealth was retarding the progress of the world. John D. Rockefeller's income was $100 per minute or equal to the incomes of 2,000 average American citizens, and to the incomes of 50 average citizens since the birth of Christ. Nearly three million children went to school without breakfast, as a striking example of man's inhumanity to man.

A friendly mathematician has figured out that Sir Joseph Flavelle's personal income from the pork packing business for the last year was a trifle over $15 an hour, or 25 cents a minute, awake and asleep, night and day, Sundays and week days. Figured on the basis of a 48-hour week his wage was $53 an hour. That is not a bad income for any one man, and it is very questionable whether the possession of a title is worth that sum to Canada. That is about all the return the people have received from Sir Joseph's title, for which they have been taxed so much.—Renfew Mercury.

TAXATION without representation has an ugly sound to British ears. Yet thousands of citizens of Canada who are still taxpayers, who are still subject to all the obligations of citizenship (save that of military service) are to be prevented by the Borden Government from choosing the representatives who impose the taxation and make the laws under which we are bound to obey. Was ever such unBritish legislation placed upon the statute books?

A Toronto preacher in his sermon on Sunday evening declared that hell was the place for war profiteers. If these men were fit for heaven, he said, "then you will have to cut the fifteenth Psalm out of the Book." We'll warrant the fifteenth Psalm has been well read since the report of the sermon was published.

"WHERE will the profiteers go to, if there is no hell?" asked Rev. Dr. Patterson of Toronto, in a sermon Sunday night at Cook's church. It's admittedly a matter of speculation, but in an event they have earned the right to sit around the fire with the kaiser.

BLINDED BY GAS SHELL

Melvin Blackburn Couldn't See Anything for a Week After His Experience with German Mustard Gas

The following interesting letter was written home from France by Melvin Blackburn, a nephew of Mr. and Mrs. R. K. Sutton. Mel. has visited here and is well-known in Walkerton.

"Here I am in old blighty again. I came day before yesterday. You will be anxious to know what happened to me. Well briefly I was gassed. This does not convey much information does it. Well, our M. G. S. crew were in an old German dugout, really a cellar of what was once a house. We were, as you know from the papers, near Lens. This was on the night of the 21st and 22nd of last month. The doorway faced Fritzies' line, and outside ran a trench which had been blown enough to allow one to drive a wagon up it. Not a very healthy spot, I assure you. I had been down the trench to bring up some magazines for our M. G. and just came back when crack a high explosive shell landed on the parapet. I dodged in the doorway and was hit with nothing more solid than a few stones. Immediately after, a gas shell burst directly in the doorway. We had our box respirators on immediately, but it was too late. We stayed on until morning and we were very sick boys by being blinded and reaching. We were taken to the dressing station, put on a light R. R. truck and started down the line with old Fritz still strafing us. A word about this new mustard gas. It contains phosophorus and lachrymating gases (tear gas) and alcohol. How does it effect you? Well, my throat is still raw as with bronchitis. My lungs are slightly touched. I was totally blind for six days and am now slowly recovering my sight. I am burned all over except my hands and feet. Well, I went in the field ambulance to the casualty clearing station, and by hospital train to No. 20 General Hospital, France, where I was kept a week before they would move me. I am at present in North Wales, but will be moved in a day or two, so do not write addressing my letters here. Answering to what you have thought I was at Vimy Easter Monday. Some day I will tell you about it. The weather was very bad, raining heavily, snow and strong wind. And we sank at every step in mud to our knees. When we came out on Wednesday night we were a weather beaten and tired bunch of boys. I will tell you all about our subsequent travels after the war. Did you hear the story about the Canadian on leaving London? He met a subaltern in the Imperials who promptly checked him up for failure to salute. The sub. said: "Do you know you Canadians give more trouble than the whole British army?" "Yes, sir; that is what the Germans say." A Henne prisoner told us, English soldier fight for country, good; French soldier fight for country, good; Canadian no fight for country, he fight for Souvenirs."

Pay Will Be The Same

Men selected under the Military Service Act will receive the same pay as those now on active service receive. Pay will start from the time a man reports for duty. Money from the Patriotic Fund and Separation Allowance will also be available for selected men.

Canadian soldiers are well paid. The fact that wages in Canada are generally higher than those paid in Europe is recognized in the system of remuneration for men on active service. Clothing and all equipment in addition to food is also supplied to the Canadian soldier, leaving him with no expense except personal incidentals.

The rate of pay for men in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, other than commissioned officers, is as follows:

	Pay	Field Allowance
Warrant Officers	$2.00	30 cts.
Regimental Sergt.-Major, if not a Warrant Officer	1.85	20 "
Quartermaster-Sergeants	1.80	20 "
Orderly Room Clerks	1.50	20 "
Orderly Room Sergeants	1.50	20 "
Pay Sergeants	1.50	20 "
Squad., Batt., or Co. Sergt.-Major	1.60	20 "
Colour-Sergeant or Staff Sergeant	1.60	20 "
Squad., Batt., or Co. Q.M.S.	1.50	20 "
Sergeants	1.35	15 "
Lance-Sergeants	1.15	15 "
Corporals	1.10	10 "
Lance-Corporals	1.05	10 "
Bombardiers, or Second Corporals	1.05	10 "
Trumpeters, Buglers, and Drummers	1.00	10 "
Privates, Gunners, Drivers	1.00	10 "
Sappers, Batmen, etc.	1.00	10 "

As in the case of those already gone overseas, Separation Allowances will be available for those dependent for livelihood upon selected men. The Separation Allowance is $20.00 per month for the rank and file, $25.00 for sergeants and staff-sergeants and $30.00 for warrant officers. The experience is that many men can afford to assign half their pay to dependents, in addition.

A considerable number of men who have enlisted in the Canadian forces have found themselves better off under the army rate of pay, which is granted in addition to board, lodging, clothing, equipment, transportation, etc., than they were while in civilian positions. Their wants are provided for, and they receive a steady addition to the bank account each month.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson II.—Fourth Quarter, For Oct. 14, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, Ez. i, 1-11—Memory Verses, 2, 3—Golden Text, Ps. cxxvi, 3—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

The seventy years captivity of Judah had begun to come to an end, but as it required eighteen years to complete their captivity in the reigns of Jehoiakim, Jehoiachim and Zedekiah we may expect the restoration to cover some years and be accomplished by different companies returning at different times. The first company was taken captive in 606 B. C., and this first company of returning ones was, according to the date at the top of the page in my Bible, 536 B. C., or just seventy years later. The times of the gentiles began with Nebuchadnezzar, in the first year of his reign, when he carried away the first captives, and just 2,520 years later, or in our 1914, the times of the gentiles seem to have begun to come to an end by this great European conflict, but whether it will take eighteen years more or less to complete their ending, we must wait to see.

It is the Lord working everywhere and at all times, and working always His purpose after the counsel of His own will (Eph. i, 9, 11). He said through Jeremiah that the captivity would be seventy years, and He said through Isaiah that He would raise up a man called Cyrus to lead in the restoration, and he called him by name about 200 years before he was born (Jer. xxv, 12; Isa. xliv, 28; xlv, 1-3). He is one of the seven men in the Bible mentioned by name before they were born. Compare the last two verses of Chronicles with the first three verses of our lesson and note how they are almost word for word the same, and remember that a repetition by the Spirit demands from us very special attention. Some of the great truths to be specially noted here are that the Lord God of heaven gave Cyrus his kingdom, and told him to build the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, and stirred up his spirit to do it, and to make proclamation throughout all his kingdom that all who were willing might go up to Jerusalem to build the house and that those who did not go should help those who did go with silver and gold and goods and beasts, besides the free will offering for the house.

Many mourning, homesick ones among the captives may possibly have given up all hope of ever returning, or if reminded by a few who did not forget the words of Jeremiah that the Lord had said they would return (for there are always a few believers like the Simeons and Annas at the time of our Lord's birth) they probably said it can never be, or how can it ever be? There are always many even among the Lord's professed followers who have no use for those who take the word of God literally, but His word stands in spite of all the scoffers and unbelievers and shall be literally fulfilled in His time.

Daniel had been a captive all through the seventy years, and he tells us that about this time, because he had been studying the words of Jeremiah, he gave himself to prayer and fasting, with confession of the sins of himself and his people, and earnestly asked God to forgive their sins and to remember Jerusalem. That prayer brought Gabriel from heaven to Daniel before he had finished praying to tell him of the Messiah, His suffering and glory, and of the time of a greater restoration than the approaching one from Babylon, when his people should be forgiven their iniquity and obtain everlasting righteousness (Dan. ix). It is just as difficult to get people to believe God now as it was then, and all the talk today is men and munitions, and who shall win in the great conflict, and how peace can be brought about, but the thought of the Lord interfering and doing something does not enter many minds. Yet it is written: "Our God shall come and shall not keep silence. A fire shall devour before Him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about Him." "Behold the Lord will come with fire and with His chariot, like a whirlwind, * * * for by fire and by His sword will the Lord plead with all flesh" (Ps. l, 3; Isa. lxvi, 15, 16). In His time He will surely do this and all else that He has purposed, and it may be soon.

The commission of our lesson was to build a literal house of the Lord at Jerusalem, and note in lesson verses 5-11 what abundant, willing provision was made for it and how Cyrus, the king, helped. The building that is now going up and is steadily growing is the church, the body and bride of Christ, to reign with Him when He shall come in His glory to set up His kingdom and make wars to cease in all the world. The church must be completed and be caught up to meet Him and the marriage of the Lamb take place before He can come in His glory. What are we doing to help build the house? Every soul won to Christ in any part of the world causes joy in the presence of the angels and helps to complete the church. Nothing else is really worth while compared with giving the gospel to those who never heard it, for only by the gospel can souls be saved, and those who have it possess it as a trust committed to them for which they must give an account (I Thess. ii, 4).

"Let Me Help You Carry the Burden, Mother"

"If Canada fails us in October, we must curtail many of our activities."
Sir ARTHUR STANLEY, Chairman, Executive Committee, British Red Cross.

It now costs $300,000.00 a week to carry on the work of the British Red Cross, or $16,000,000.00 a year.

Every minute of the day and night it costs $30 to minister to the sick and wounded and dying.

Last year Ontario's magnificent contribution paid for the entire work of the British Red Cross for nearly six weeks.

This year, in view of the greater need, it is earnestly and confidently hoped that Ontario's contributions will be as great proportionately as the magnificent offering of last year.

Our trust is, that the Citizens of Ontario will give generously to this noble cause on—to the property, as the Board of Health had forbidden him to use the cess-pool which the contractor had constructed for him. Streets Committee recommended that no sewer be built, as the Council had no funds for such a purpose this year.

A Few Facts about British Red Cross Work.

The British Red Cross Society is the only institution which carries voluntary aid to the Sick and Wounded of the British forces on land and sea in every region of the War.

Its work is therefore the concern of all classes of British subjects, whether living in the British Isles, in the Dominions and Colonies beyond the seas, or in foreign countries.

George Detzler, the town scavenger, complained that a good many citizens had not yet complied with the by-law passed at the beginning of the year, instructing citizens to get their closets in shape for the scavenger. A good many citizens had gone so far as to order him off their premises. Mayor Johnston instructed the scavenger to hand in the list to the Chief and all citizens not complying with the terms of the by-law will be prosecuted.

Dr. Farewell asked for permission to cut down and trim some trees in front of his property. Request was granted, the work to be done under supervision of Streets Committee.

Wingfelder & Krueger and Bruder & Loos, butchers, petitioned the Council to charge a license to farmers selling meat on the market, on the ground that they have to pay a business tax, property tax, and keep an expensive plant and that said competition is unfair.

Mr. John Rowland, who championed the butcher's case before the Council, said he was not there to knock anybody, but the town needed the butchers and they could not stand up against such competition. In fairness all transient meat dealers should pay some license fee.

In forwarding an account for printing "Pay-up notices" which were sent to Patriotic and Red Cross subscribers, Mr. H. M. Lay, sec treas. of the Walkerton Campaign of 1916, volunteered the information that $1,000 of the seven thousand dollars subscribed by citizens last year had not been paid up.

St. John's Industrial School, Toronto, sent an account for $9.60, for the first month's keep of a Walkerton boy sent down in September. Left over to investigate.

SUNDAY SCHOOL WORKERS

Of South Bruce Hold A Successful Convention at Pinkerton on Thursday.

The Annual Convention of the East Bruce Sunday School Association held at the Presbyterian Church, Pinkerton, on Thursday, proved to be a helpful and inspiring gathering. In spite of the unfavorable weather, about half of the schools of the County were represented.

Devotional exercises were conducted by the pastor of the church, Rev. R. M. Gale, after which the president of the Association, Rev. C. W. Cosens took charge.

The report presented by the Secretary-treasurer, Miss Maud McCoy of Cargill, showed that of 28 schools on the list, 21 had reported. The total enrollment for the 21 schools was 1722. Of these 21 schools, 13 have cradle rolls, 1 school has a Home Department, 3 have Temperance Superintendents, 6 have observed Decision Day during the year. 36 scholars were reported added to the church roll. The 21 schools contributed to Missions $205.08.

A roll call of schools was taken and delegates reported on the progress of the work in their various schools.

Rev. J. H. Grenzenbach gave a very helpful address on "The Worth and Winning of the child."

Miss Bertha Laine, Provincial Superintendent of the Elementary and Home Departments, spoke on teaching the little folks. She urged separation of the various classes by screens or curtains if possible and the use of pictures.

The evening session opened with devotional exercises conducted by Rev. R. M. Gale, and appropriate anthem ably rendered by the choir.

The report of the nominating tee was adopted as follows:— P Mr. Howard Hettrick, Pinker President, Miss Maud McCoy Sec. treas., Mr. Lorne Eedy ton. Supt's. of Department entary, Mrs. P. R. Moore, Secondary, for girls, Miss A en of Walkerton, for boys, McCool of Walkerton; Teache ing, Rev. Thos. Wilson of W Missionary, Rev. R. M. Gale ton; Temperance, Mr. T. H. Glamis.

Rev. Mr. Bradley of Teesw on "Evangelism in the Sunday showing the importance of wi children to Christ, teaching t only to know about Jesus but t him.

A solo by Mr. James Gale was appreciated.

Miss Laine of Toronto addr convention on "Missionary Trainin the Sunday School," giving ways means by which children may be instructed in missions. She referred to the practice in some Sunday Schools of taking a missionary collection without letting the children know how the money was to be spent or anything about the work. Education should go hand in hand with giving. Every school should have a missionary supt. or secretary and regular days, monthly or quarterly, given over to Missions. There should be missionary study from the desk as well as in the class, and a good list of books are recommended for this purpose. Missionary offerings should be systematic in the Sunday School and the duplex envelope is recommended for the purpose.

The new president, Mr. Howard Hettrick was introduced by Rev. Mr. Cosens, after which a hearty vote of thanks was moved by Rev. C. W. Cosens, seconded by Mr. J. Purdy, tendering to the Pinkerton people the hearty thanks of the delegates for their kindness and generous hospitality.

HANOVER

Mr. J. D. Schaefer recently sold his dog, "Boston Rex," to a man in Kitchener. J. D. went to see him some time after. The owner has just reported that after that the dog refused to eat and seemed quite home sick, at any rate he left home on the third morning managed to get to the Station and boarded the passenger train to Hanover. The conducter not finding his owner among the passengers, took him back on the next train and had him returned to his owner.

Several airplanes flew over the town last week en route from Toronto to Southampton. One came down in a field near the C. P. R. station and a large number of interested spectators from the town went to see it. The aviator, quite a young chap, said he came down for gasoline. He said it was very cold some days in the air but was comparatively mild on Tuesday. He made his ascent quite easily.

A nasty accident occurred at the Grand Trunk yards here when Wesley Johnston, brakeman of Palmerston, had five ribs broken and was otherwise injured in being jammed between two cars. The train crew were shunting a car onto the siding of the Spiesz Furniture Co. when the accident happened. There is quite a grade at this point and Johnston, who was bending over working at the coupling, had his back to the car which had been shunted up the grade and he did not notice it come back. He was caught in the chest sustaining five broken ribs, but fell clear. When picked up he stated to those about "that this is the end" but while his injuries are serious, fatal results are not anticipated. Johnston is a married man about 25 years of age.

HEALTHIEST ONE IN THE FAMILY

No Sign Of Dropsy And Kidney Trouble Since Taking "FRUIT-A-TIVES"

HATTIE WARREN

Port Robinson, Ont., July 8th, 1915.

"We have used "Fruit-a-tives" in our house for over three years and have always found them a good medicine. Our little girl, Hattie, was troubled with Kidney Disease. The Doctor said she was threatened with Dropsy. Her limbs and body were all swollen and we began to think she could not live. Finally, we decided to try "Fruit-a-tives". She began to show improvement after we had given her a few tablets. In a short time, the swelling had all gone down and her flesh began to look more natural. Now she is the healthiest one in the family and has no signs of the old ailment. We can not say too much for "Fruit-a-tives" and would never be without them".

To Improve Party-Line Service

WE suggest consideration for the persons who may be talking on your party-line. Do not interrupt their conversation. It is discourteous and unfair.

1. Answer only your own signal. If there is any confusion about the rings, report the fact promptly to the Chief Operator.
2. When you wish to call, remove the receiver and listen. If the line is in use hang up the receiver and wait until the conversation is finished.
3. Do not allow children or others to listen on the line when it is in use or to play with the telephone at any time.
4. Make your calls as brief as possible. Short conversations will keep the line open and make the service of most value to everyone.

unreasonably expected millions at a twist of the wrist, and the words "12 cents," had a rankly preposterous sound to us. However, the miner patiently explained that a twelve cent pan was a very good one, and indubitably it was real gold.

Yank, being older and less excitable had not accompanied us to the water side.

"Well, boys," he drawled, "that 12 cents is highly satisfactory, of course but in the meantime we've lost about $100 worth of hoss and grub."

Surely enough, our animals had tired of waiting for us and had moved out packs and all. We hastily shouldered our implements.

"Don't you want to keep this claim next me?" inquired our acquaintance.

We stopped.

"Surely!" I replied. "But how do we do it?"

"Just leave your pick and shovel in the hole."

"Won't some one steal them?"

"No."

"What's to prevent?" I asked a little skeptically.

"Miner's law," he replied.

We almost immediately got trace of our strayed animals, as a number of men had seen them going upstream. In fact, we had no difficulty whatever in finding them, for they had simply followed up the rough stream bed between the canyon walls until it had opened up to a gentler slope and a hanging garden of grass and flowers. Here they had turned aside and were feeding. We caught them and were just heading them back when Yank stopped short.

"What's the matter with this here?" he inquired. "Here's feed and water near, and it ain't so very far back to the diggings."

We looked about us for the first time with seeing eyes. The little up sloping meadow was blue and dull red with flowers, below us the stream brawled foam flecked among black rocks, the high hills rose up to meet the sky, and at our backs across the way the pines stood thick serried. Far up in the blue heavens some birds were circling slowly. Somehow the leisurely swing of these unhasting birds struck from us the feverish hurry that had lately filled our souls. We drew deep breaths, and for the first time the great peace and majesty of these California mountains cooled our spirits.

"I think it's a bully place, Yank," said Johnny soberly, "and that little bench up above us looks flat."

We clambered across the slant of the flower spangled meadow to the bench, just within the fringe of the pines. It proved to be flat, and from the edge of it down the hill seeped a little spring marked by the feathery bracken. We entered a cool green place, peopled with shadows and the rare, considered notes of soft voiced birds. Just over our threshold, as it were, was the sunlit, chirpy, buzzing, bright colored busy world. Overhead a wind of many voices hummed through the pine tops. The golden sunlight flooded the mountains opposite, flashed from the stream, lay languorous on the meadow. Long bars of it slanted through an unguessed gap in the hills behind us to touch with magic the very tops of the trees over our heads. The sheen of the precious metal was over the land.

CHAPTER XIII.

The First Gold.

WE arose before daylight, picketed our horses, left our dishes unwashed and hurried down to the diggings just at sunup, carrying our gold pans, or "washbowls," and our extra tools. The bar was as yet deserted. We set to work with a will, taking turns with the pickax and the two shovels. I must confess that our speed slowed down considerably after the first wild burst, but we kept at it steadily. It was hard work, and there is no denying it, just the sort of plain hard work the day laborer does when he digs sewer trenches in the city streets, only worse, perhaps, owing to the nature of the soil. It had struck me since that those few years of hard labor in the diggings, from '49 to '53 or '54, saw more actual manual toil accomplished than was ever before performed in the same time by the same number of men. The discouragement of those returning we now understood. They had expected to take the gold without toil and were dismayed at the labor it had required. At any rate, we thought we were doing our share that morning, especially after the sun came up. We wielded our implements manfully, piled our debris to one side and gradually achieved a sort of crumbling uncertain excavation reluctant to stay emptied.

About an hour after our arrival the other miners began to appear, smoking their pipes. They stretched themselves lazily, spat upon their hands and set to. Our friend of the day before nodded at us cheerfully and hopped down into his hole.

We removed what seemed to us tons of rock. About noon, just as we were thinking rather dispiritedly of knocking off work for a lunch, which in our early morning eagerness we had forgotten to bring, Johnny turned up a shovelful whose lower third consisted of the pulverized bluish clay. We promptly forgot both lunch and our own weariness.

"Hey!" shouted our friend, scrambling from his own claim. "Easy with the rocks! What are you conducting here, a volcano?" He peered down at us. "Pay dirt, hey? Well, take it easy. It won't run away."

Take it easy! As well ask us to quit entirely! We tore at the rubble, which aggravatingly and obstinately cascaded down upon us from the sides. We scraped eagerly for more of that blue clay. At last we had filled our three pans with a rather mixed lot of the dirt and raced to the river. Johnny fell over a bowlder and scattered his panful far and wide. His manner of scuttling back to the hole after more reminded me irresistibly of the way a contestant in a candle race hurries back to the starting point to get his candle relighted.

We panned that dirt clumsily and hastily enough and undoubtedly lost much valuable sand overside, but we ended each with a string of color. We crowded together, comparing our pans. Then we went crazy. I suppose we had about a quarter of a dollar's worth of gold between us, but that was not the point. The long journey with all its hardships and adventures, the toil, the uncertainty, the hopes, the disappointments and reactions had at last their visible tangible conclusion. The tiny flecks of gold were a symbol. We yapped aloud, we kicked up our heels, we shook hands, we finally joined hands and danced around and around.

We worked with entire absorption, quite oblivious to all that was going on about us. It was only by accident that Yank looked up at last, so I do not know how long Don Gaspar had been there.

"Will you look at that?" cried Yank.

Don Gaspar, still in his embroidered boots, his crimson velvet breeches, his white linen and his sombrero, but without the blue and silver jacket, was busily wielding a pickax a hundred feet or so away. His companion, or servant, was doing the heavier shovel work.

"Why, oh, why," breathed Johnny at last, "do you suppose, if he must mine, he doesn't buy himself a suit of dungarees or a flannel shirt?"

"I'll bet it's the first hard work he ever did in his life," surmised Yank.

"And I'll bet he won't do that very long," I guessed.

But Don Gaspar seemed to have more sticking power than we gave him credit for. We did not pay him much further attention, for we were busy with our own affairs, but every time we glanced in his direction he appeared to be still at it. Our sack of sand was growing heavier, as, indeed, were our limbs. As a matter of fact we had been at harder work than any of us had been accustomed to for very long hours, beneath a scorching sun, without food and under strong excitement. We did not know when to quit, but the sun at last decided it for us by dipping below the mountains to the west.

The following days were replicas of the first. We ate hurriedly at odd times; we worked feverishly; we sank into our tumbled blankets at night too tired to wiggle. But the buckskin sack of gold was swelling and rounding out most satisfactorily. By the end of the week it contained over a pound!

But the long hours, the excitement and the inadequate food told on our nerves. We snapped at each other impatiently at times and once or twice came near to open quarreling. Johnny and I were constantly pecking at each other over the most trivial concerns.

One morning we were halfway to the bar when we remembered that we had neglected to picket out the horses. It was necessary for one of us to go back, and we were all reluctant to do so.

"I'll be —— if I'm going to lug 'way up that hill," I growled to myself. "I tied them up yesterday, anyway."

Johnny caught this.

"Well, it wasn't your turn yesterday," he pointed out, "and it is today. I've got nothing to do with what you chose to do yesterday."

"Or any other day," I muttered.

"What's that?" cried Johnny truculently. "I couldn't hear. Speak up!"

We were flushed and eying each other malevolently.

"That'll do!" said Yank, with an unexpected tone of authority. "Nobody will go back and nobody will go ahead. We'll just sit down on this log yere while we smoke one pipe apiece. I've got something to say."

Johnny and I turned on him with a certain belligerency mingled with surprise. Yank had so habitually acted the part of taciturnity that his decided air of authority confused us. His slouch had straightened; his head was up; his mild eye sparkled. Suddenly I felt like a bad small boy, and I believe Johnny was the same. After a moment's hesitation we sat down on the log.

"Now," said Yank firmly, "it's about time we took stock. We been here now five days. We ain't had a decent meal of vittles in that time. We ain't fixed up our camp a mite. We ain't been to town to see the sights. We don't even know the looks of the man that's camped down below us. We've been too danged busy to be decent. Now we're goin' to call a halt. I should jedge we have a pound of gold or thereabouts. How much is that worth, Johnny? You can figger in yore head."

"Along about $250," said Johnny after a moment.

"Well, keep on figgerin'. How much does that come to apiece?"

"About $80, of course."

"And dividin' eighty by five?" persisted Yank.

"Sixteen."

"Well," drawled Yank, his steely blue eye softening to a twinkle, "$16 a day is fair wages, to be sure, but nothin' to get wildly excited over." He surveyed the two of us with some humor. "Hadn't thought of it that way, had you?" he asked. "Nuther had I until last night. I was so dog tired I couldn't sleep, and I got to figgerin' a little on my own hook."

"Why, I can do better than that in San Francisco, with half the work!" I cried.

"Maybe for awhile," said Yank, "but here we got a chance to make a big strike most any time and in the meantime to make good wages. But we ain't goin' to do it any quicker by killin' ourselves. Now, today is Sunday. I ain't no religious man, but Sunday is a good day to quit. I propose we go back to camp peaceable, make a decent place to stay, cook ourselves up a squar' meal, wash out our clothes, visit the next camp, take a look at town and enjoy ourselves."

Thus vanished the first and most wonderful romance of the gold. Reduced to wages it was somehow no longer so marvelous. The element of uncertainty was always there, to be sure, and an inexplicable fascination, but no longer had we any desire to dig up the whole place immediately. I suppose we moved nearly as much earth, but the fibers of our minds were relaxed, and we did it more easily and with less nervous wear and tear.

Also, as Yank suggested, we took pains to search out our fellow beings. The camper below us proved to be Don Gaspar, velvet breeches and all. He received us hospitably and proffered perfumed cigarettes, which we did not like, but which we smoked out of politeness. Our common ground of meeting was at first the natural one of the gold diggings. Don Gaspar and his man, whom he called Vasquez, had produced somewhat less flake gold than ourselves, but exhibited a half ounce nugget and several smaller lumps. We could not make him out. Neither his appearance nor his personal equipment suggested necessity, and yet he labored as hard as the rest of us. His gaudy costume was splashed and grimy with the red mud, although evidently he had made some attempt to brush it. The linen was, of course, hopeless. He showed us the blisters on his small aristocratic looking hands.

"It is the hard work," he stated simply, "but one gets the gold."

From that subject we passed on to horses. He confessed that he was uneasy as to the safety of his own magnificent animals and succeeded in alarming us as to our own.

"Those Indian," he told us, "are always out to esteal, and the paisanos. It has been tole me that Andreas Andejo and his robbers are near. Some day we lose our horse."

Our anxiety at this time was given an edge by the fact that the horses, having fed well and becoming tired of the same place, were inclined to stray. It was impossible to keep them always on picket lines—the nature of the meadow would not permit it—and they soon learned to be very clever with their hobbles. Several mornings we put in an hour or so hunting them up and bringing them in before we could start work for the day. This wasted both time and temper. The result was that we drifted into partnership with Don Gaspar and Vasquez. I do not remember who proposed the arrangement. Indeed, I am inclined to think it just came about naturally from our many discussions of the subject. Under the terms of it we appointed Vasquez to cook all the meals, take full care of the horses, chop the wood, draw the water and keep camp generally. The rest of us worked in couples at the bar. We divided the gold into five equal parts.

CHAPTER XIV.

At Hangman's Gulch.

OUR visit to the town we postponed from day to day because we were either too busy or too tired. We thought we could about figure out what that crude sort of village would be like. Then on Saturday evening our neighbor with the twinkling eye—whom we called McNally without conviction because he told us to—informed us that there would be a miners' meeting next day and that we would be expected to attend.

Accordingly we visited the town. The street was full of men, idling slowly to and fro. All the larger structures were wide open, and from within could be heard the sounds of hurdy gurdies, loud laughter and noisy talk. At one end of the street a group was organizing a horse race, and toward this Don Gaspar took his immediate departure. A smaller group surrounded two wrestlers. At one side a jumping match was going on.

The two gambling places and saloons were hard at it. The low rooms were full of smoke and crowded with slowly jostling men. In contrast to the deadly quiet of such places in San Francisco, these were full of noise and hubbub. The men moved restlessly, threw down their little bags of dust impatiently and accepted victory or defeat with very audible comments. The gamblers, dressed in black, pale, sat steady eyed and silent behind their layouts.

It was about 4 o'clock when the meeting was brought to a formal conclusion. The crowd dispersed slowly in different directions and to its different occupations and amusements. We wandered about, all eyes and ears. As yet we had not many acquaintances and could not enter into the intimate bantering life of the old timers. There was enough to interest us, however. A good many were beginning to show the drink. After a long period of hard labor even the most respectable of the miners would have at times strange reactions. That is another tale, however, and on this Sunday the drinking was productive only of considerable noise and boasting. Two old codgers, head to head, were bragging laboriously of their prowess as cooks. A small but interested group egged them on.

Yank and I then thought of going back to camp and began to look around after Johnny, who had disappeared, when McNally rolled up, inviting us to sup with him.

"You don't want to go home yet," he advised us. "Evening's the time to have fun. Never mind your friend. He's all right. Now you realize the disadvantage of living way off where you do. My hangout is just down the street. Let's have a drink."

We Found Johnny, Rather Flushed, Bucking a Faro Bank.

We accepted both his invitations. Then, after the supper, pipes alight, we sauntered down the street, a vast leisure expanding our horizons.

We entered the gambling rooms, of which there were two, and had a drink of what McNally called "42 caliber whisky" at the bar of each. In one of them we found Johnny, rather flushed, bucking a faro bank. Yank suggested that he join us, but he shook his head impatiently, and we moved on. In a tremendous tent made by joining three or four ordinary tents together a very lively fiddle and concertina were in full blast. We entered and were pounced upon by a boisterous group of laughing men and had to join in the festivities.

About 10 o'clock we were getting tired, and probably the reaction from the "42 caliber whisky" was making us drowsy. We hunted up Johnny, still at his faro game, but he positively and impatiently declined to accompany us. He said he was ahead—or behind, I forget which. I notice both conditions have the same effect of keeping a man from quitting. We therefore left him and wandered home through the soft night, wherein were twinkling stars, gentle breezes, little voices and the silhouettes of great trees.

Johnny did not return at all that night, but showed up next morning at the diggings, looking blear eyed and sleepy. He told us he had slept with a friend and replied rather curtly that he was a "little behind the game." I believe myself that he was cleaned out, but that was none of our business. Every night we divided the dust into five parts. Don Gaspar and Vasquez got two of these. The remainder we again divided into four. I took charge of Talbot's share. We carried the dust always with us, for the camp was no longer safe from thieves.

About this time the first of the overland wagon trains began to come through. Hangman's Gulch was not on the direct route, but some enterprising individual had found our trail fairly practicable for wagons and ten miles shorter than the regular road. After that many followed, and soon we had a well cleared road. They showed plainly the hardships of a long journey, for the majority of them were thin, sick looking and discouraged. Few of them stopped at the diggings, although most had come west in hopes of gold, but pushed on down to the pastures of the Sacramento. They were about worn out and needed to recuperate before beginning anything new. Some were out of provisions and practically starved. The Yankee storekeeper sold food at terrible rates. I remember that quinine, a drug much in demand, cost a dollar a grain! We used to look up from our diggings at the procession of these sad faced, lean men walking by their emaciated cattle and the women peering from the wagons and be very thankful that we had decided against the much touted overland route.

One day, however, an outfit went through of quite a different character. We were apprised of its approach by a hunter named Bagsby. He loped down the trail to the river level very much in a hurry.

"Boys," he shouted, "quit work! Come see what's coming down the trail!" with which he charged back again up the hill.

His great excitement impressed us, for Bagsby, like most of the old time Rocky mountain men, was not ordinarily what one would call an emotional individual. Therefore we dropped our tools and surged up the hill as fast as we could go. I think we suspected Indians.

A train of three wagons drawn by strong oxen was lurching slowly down the road. It differed little from others of its kind, save that the cattle were in better shape, and the men walking alongside, of the tall, competent backwoodsman type, seemed well and hearty. But perhaps a hundred yards ahead of the leading wagon came a horse, the only horse in the outfit, and on it, riding sidesaddle, was a girl. She was a very pretty red cheeked girl, and she must have stopped within a half mile or so of the camp in order to get herself up for this impressive entrance. Her dress was of blue calico, with a white yoke and heavy flounces or panniers. Around her neck was a black velvet ribbon. On her head was a big leghorn hat with red roses. She rode through the town, her head high, like a princess, and we all cheered her like mad. Not once did she look at us, but I could see her bosom heaving with excitement beneath her calico and her nostrils wide. She was a remarkably pretty girl, and this was certainly the moment of her triumph.

About this time we had to come to some sort of a decision, for our provisions were about exhausted. We had no desire to replenish our stock from that of the local storekeeper. We were doing pretty well in the diggings, but we had also fairly healthy appetites, and I am convinced that at the prices that man charged we should have no more than kept even. Williams, the storekeeper, was levying double profits, one from us and one from the overland immigrants. Don Gaspar proposed we send out Vasquez with all the horses to restock at Sutter's Fort. We were a trifle doubtful as to whether Vasquez would ever come back, but Don Gaspar seemed to have confidence in his man. Finally, though a little doubtfully, we came to the plan. Don Gaspar sent out also to McClellan for safe keeping his accumulations of gold dust, but we did not go quite that far. In view of probable high prices we intrusted him with eighteen ounces for the purchase of goods.

While he was away we came to another decision. It had been for some weeks preparing. The diggings were becoming overcrowded. Almost every foot of the bar was occupied, and more men were coming in every day. No longer could the newcomer be sure of his color the afternoon of his arrival, but was forced to prospect here and there up and down the river until he found a patch of the pay dirt. Most trusted simply to luck, but some had systems on which they worked. I have seen divining rods used. The believers in chance seemed to do as well as any one else.

But, also, our own yield was decreasing. The last week we had gained only nineteen ounces all told. This might be merely a lean bit of misfortune, or it might mean that we had taken the best from our ten claims. Since the human mind is prone to changes, we inclined to the latter theory. We were getting restless. No miner ever came to California who did not believe firmly that he would have done much better had he come out one voyage earlier, and no miner ever found diggings so rich that he had not a sneaking suspicion that he could do even better "a little farther on."

Our restlessness was further increased by the fact that we were now seeing a good deal of Sam Bagsby, the hunter. He and Yank had found much in common and forgathered of evenings before our campfire.

Bagsby was a man of over fifty, tall and straight as a youngster, with a short white beard, a gray eye and hard, tanned flesh. He was a typical Rocky mountain man, wearing even in the hottest weather his fur cap with the tail hanging behind, his deerskin moccasins and his fringed buckskin hunting shirt. Mining possessed no interest for him whatever. He was by profession a trapper, and he had crossed the plains a half dozen times.

"No mining for me!" he stated emphatically. "I paddled around after the stuff for awhile, till my hands swelled up like p'ison and my back creaked like a frozen pine tree in the wind. Then I quit, and I stayed quit. I'm a hunter, and I'm makin' a good livin', because I ain't very particular on how I live."

"But why don't you fellows branch out!" Bagsby always ended.

He and Yank smoked interminable pipes and swapped yarns. Johnny and I liked nothing better than to keep quiet and listen to them. Bagsby had come out with Captain Sutter and told of that doughty soldier's early skirmishes with the Indians. His tales of the mountains, the plains and the game and Indians were so much romance to us, and we both wished heartily that fate could have allowed us a chance at such adventures.

"But why don't you fellows branch out?" Bagsby always ended. "What

Worth Protecting

A good article is worthy of a good package. A rich, strong, delicious tea like Red Rose is worth putting into a sealed package to keep it fresh and good.

A cheap, common tea is hardly worth taking care of and is usually sold in bulk. Red Rose is always sold in the sealed package which keeps it good.

Awarded Military Medal

Gunner B. B. Patten, formerly of the Merchants Bank staff, has been awarded the Military Medal for "mending the lines under uncomfortable circumstances". Patten has many friends here who will be pleased to learn of his distinction. He has been at Lens the past two months where some of the most desperate fighting of the War has taken place.

Yielded Valuable Crop.

A young farmer on the 4th concession of Carrick recently threshed his grain, when it was ascertained that his ten acres of fall wheat had yielded 27 bushels per acre. The wheat was considerably heavier than standard, and at the present price, the ten acres yielded a crop worth $[illegible]. There must be some foundation for the rumor that these are good times for the farmer.—Mildmay Gazette.

Town Is Improved

Mr. Alex. Menzies was in town last week and received warm handshakes from many of his old friends. It is now eleven years since Mr. Menzies removed to Dundas. He noted many improvements in appearance of the old town since the days that he was Mayor of Walkerton. Mr. Menzies was accompanied by Mrs. Menzies, and their daughter, Mrs. Barker of Oshawa and her two little children. While here they were guests at Mr. Robt. Richardson's.

Medical Work In India

Great Britain has the strong sympathy and support of the people of India in the present War because of England's great fairness in dealing with the Hindus, was the statement made by Rev. Dr. Smith in the course of a most interesting and educative address at the Baptist Church last week. Dr. Smith has been 24 years in India as a medical missionary, and his story of the needs of India along missionary lines is most gripping. A silver collection of $22.50 was taken. Mrs. (Rev.) G. C. Rock occupied the chair.

Organizing In Bruce

Steps have already been taken to organize Bruce County in the Dominion-wide personal canvass for the Victory War Loan. The bond dealers have offered the services of their salesmen to the government and County organizers are being sent out. Mr. W. H. Barber will be the organizer for Bruce. Mr. David Robertson of Walkerton has been asked to accept the Chairmanship of a Bruce County organization and Mr. Geo. D. McKay the secretaryship. These gentlemen purpose calling a mass meeting of the citizens of Bruce shortly to get behind the new Victory Loan and see that this County does its share towards boosting the Victory Loan.

Anderson—McMorran

A pretty house wedding was solemnized at Somerset, Man. on Wednesday afternoon, October 3rd, 1917, at 2.30, when Nina, twin daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. W. McMorran of Somerset, formerly of Bruce County, was married to Mr. Allen Anderson of Erickson. The bride looked charming in a cream serge suit and flesh colored silk blouse. The Rev. Campbell of Swan Lake performed the ceremony and only relatives were present. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. Anderson motored to Treherne, en route for their new home at Erickson, where Mr. Anderson teaches school, accompanied by the congratulations and hearty good wishes of their friends for a happy and prosperous future.

Died at Toronto.

Joseph Jones, a well known former resident of the town, died at Toronto on Saturday, Oct. 6th, in his 82nd. year. Mr. Jones lived here for a great many years, being employed as a shoemaker. He was a man of quiet but sociable disposition and had many friends. Three years ago Mr. and Mrs. Jones and Miss Jones went to live with their daughter Mrs. Squirrell at Toronto. Besides his wife, he leaves two daughters, Mrs. Squirrell and Miss Eva of Toronto, and one son Joseph of London. The remains were brought to Walkerton for interment, the funeral taking place on the arrival of the G. T. R. train Tuesday morning. Rev. R. Perdue conducted the service. The following friends acted as pall-bearers:—Messrs R. H. McKay, Ed. Pengelly, Alex. Grant, Geo. Carbert, Rev. J. W. Sanderson, and S. Earwaker.

If other Grocers bought tea in as large quantities as we do they would be able to sell you good tea as cheaply as we do but what's the use o' buying big if you don't sell big, that's the way the other fellows look at the matter—and rightly so.

The tea we want you to try is the kind we are selling everyday to satisfy customers.

HYDRO ELECTRIC COM.

Should Get Busy at Once if They Intend to Play Fair With the People of Walkerton.

If the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario intends to keep faith with the people of Walkerton, it is up to them to show some tangible evidence of their intention without further delay. Last year the Council was given promise from time to time that information would be forthcoming from the Hydro office which would enable the people to vote intelligently. Definite information was not forthcoming, and it was simply due to the people's overwhelming confidence in hydro, backed by verbal assurances from Hydro Engineer James, that the Enabling By-law carried by a vote of 274 to 90. This year's Council accepted the responsibility of submitting a Hydro money by-law to the people but thus far their experience has been similar to last year's. Assurance has been received from time to time that the figures would be shortly forthcoming but it is now the eleventh hour and the figures upon which a money by-law must be based, are still lacking. The people of Walkerton have done their part and we believe they deserve better treatment from the Hydro Electric Power Commission.

Quiting Business

Reeve Russell, who has been conducting a dairy business for a number of years, announces that he is going to quit at the end of the present month. Business has been good and fairly profitable but it is the help problem that has the Reeve down and out. With all of his five boys at the Front, men hard to get and himself in poor health he has had a hard struggle to keep his rigs on the move. His daughter has courageously helped by taking a man's place on a rig but with the bad weather coming on more help was needed and not forthcoming. Mr. Russell has given his customers good service year after year and built up a large trade. He has no definite plans as to what he will engage in.

ALL WANT EXEMPTION

28 Young Men Have Applied at the Local Post Office—Not One Offers His Service.

Twenty-eight persons have called at the Post Office wicket thus far and asked for conscription forms and every one of the 28 is seeking exemption. With 0 per cent of the young manhood of Walkerton offering themselves for service, it looks like busy days ahead for the local tribunal.

The eligibles will receive notice from headquarters in regard to the place and time to report before the local tribunals. The Walkerton tribunal, composed of Messrs Frank Rennie and John Johnston, will probably obtain the use of the Town Council Chamber, where they will begin sitting on November 8th.

A number of young men have been going down every day to Harriston for medical examination and the great majority have been put in Class A. There has been a good deal of complaint about the inconvenience of getting to Harriston from the northern parts of the county. On Saturday there were so many on hand that a lot of them actually had to go home and come back again another day. Starting this week, the Medical Board sits the first three days of the week at Wiarton, a much better arrangements.

Judging from the instructions handed out to the military representatives at a meeting at London last Thursday at which Mr. W. J. McNally of Walkerton was present, exemption is likely to be granted only in cases where the claim is very strong. According to the military authorities opinion, bank clerks are not considered indispensible to the community, neither are builders, bakers, butchers, book-keepers. Farmers according to the same authorities, are to have 1½ men for every 150 acres.

In Pinkerton Presbyterian Church hangs an Honour Roll, bearing the names of the boys of that Congregation who are at the Front. No less than seventeen names are on that roll and of these three have made the supreme sacrifice. The names are:—Harold Pinkerton, *Ernest A. Reid, Dr. John A. Reid, Elmer Gregg, Samuel Reaburn, Andrew J. Bain, Edgar Campbell, John Woelfle, Gordon Garland, Lorne Reid, William Bell, Gordon Pinkerton, Henry Campbell, *Edgar Garland, *John McAfee, Russell G. Birrell. The names with asterick are those who were killed in action.

BACK FROM OVERSEAS

Pte. David Seiling, Walkerton's Youngest War Veteran, Invalided Home From the Front—Was In Big Somme Drive.

Pte. David Seiling, son of Mr. and Mrs. William Seiling, arrived home from Overseas on Saturday night. Pte. Seiling is the youngest war veteran that has yet returned to Bruce. He is barely eighteen years of age and yet he has been through some of the hardest fighting of the war and is now invalided home. It was in the big drive on the Somme a year ago that he got his wounds. A bad shrapnel wound in his left arm and a hit on the temple. A bursting shell did it, pitching him headlong in an unconscious condition. It was some months before he recovered from the effects of the blow in the head and even yet he is troubled with nerves. A piece of shrapnel is still lodged in his arm, and will require a further operation. Pte. Seiling expects to fully recover from his disability but it will take some time. Pte. Seiling went over to England with the 71st. He crossed to France with the 44th Batt'n in July 1916. He spent several months in the hospitals in England and speaks highly of the treatment that the soldiers receive there. The devotion of the nurses at the receiving stations was to him entirely beyond comprehension. Every wounded soldier, he says, has a higher idea of the goodness and heroism of womanhood.

He left on Wednesday morning to report at London but expects to be back to town in a few days

House-keeper Wanted

For family of two. Apply in writing, stating salary expected to box 158, Walkerton.

Public Reception.

On Friday night a public reception will be given to Ptes. Norman Webb and David Sieling at the Town Hall at 8 o'clock.

Victim Of Stroke

Mrs. McDonald, an aged inmate of the House of Refuge, was stricken with paralysis on Monday and is in a very low condition. She came to the institution a year ago from Ripley.

Some Potatoes!

Mr. Justus Holm has in his possession two potatoes, either of which would make a meal for an ordinary family. They weigh five lbs. together and were grown on the farm of his son, Mr. Julius Holm, con. Brant.

Took Ill at School

Wallace, the 12 year old son, of Mr. Henry Hunt, West Ward was taken suddenly ill at the Public School with acute appendicitis. Mr. James Whitehead took the lad home in his car where he is now improving under the doctors care.

I. O. D. E. Hallowe'en Fete.

Supper will be served in the Town Hall from 5.30 to 7 o'clock for 25cts. During the evening Hallowe'en frolics and amusements will be given. Admission to Hall without supper 10cts. Come and enjoy the fun, Wednesday, Oct. 31st.

At Lutheran Church.

Thanksgiving Service and Sacrament of the Lord's Supper were held at the Lutheran Church on Sunday, service being conducted by the former pastor, Rev. H. R. Moeig of New Hamburg. The church was filled to its capacity. All the members turning out to hear their pastor who so ably led them for five years.

Joining The Benedicts

Mr. J. T. Clancy, G. T. R. Agent, leaves this week on holidays. When he returns he will be accompanied by a charming bride. It is less than a year since "Jim" came down from Cargill where his departure made a big hole in the bowling club, in the social life of the village, and in the landscape. Already he has made himself solid with the public here. His courteous and genial ways, and all round efficiency, are a combination hard to beat. The Telescope will be happy to unite with his many friends here on his return in extending hearty congratulations to Benedict James T. Clancy.

Death of Jos. Hewitt

Joseph Hewitt, who was formerly employed as hostler at several local hotels, passed away at his home in the West Ward early Sunday morning in his 56th year. He had been poorly for the past two years with heart trouble. Deceased lived for many years around Black Horse and Riverdale where he is well-known. Twenty years ago or more he was nearly burned to death in a fire in New Ontario, his ears being almost burned off. He is survived by a widow, formerly Miss Katherine Krueger of Walkerton. The funeral [illegible] k place on Tuesday, the remains [illegible] taken to Kincardine for interment.

MORE KNITTERS NEEDED

Walkerton Lady Says That Women do not Appreciate the Situation and Should Better Themselves.

"Talk about Slackers!" said a lady who is prominent in patriotic work to the Telescope," "the women are a good deal worse than the men". This lady went on to say that the need for knitted socks for the soldiers is becoming greater and greater and yet so many of the women instead of redoubling their efforts to meet the demands are slackening up and straining their ears to hear idle stories that "socks aren't needed". The need is simply so great among the French soldiers, according to our informant who is in close touch with headquarters, "that French soldiers are being sent sent off to the Front, wearing newspapers on their feet instead of socks." Naturally the French women who are busy doing men's work haven't time to knit with the woeful result noted above. The Red Cross is helping the French soldiers and the help of every Canadian women who can ply a knitting needle is urgently needed. It is true that some Canadian boys who have two or three families at home knitting for them are well supplied but these are in the vast minority. Women who keep posted on the situation are more than ever impressed with the tremendous need and get out of patience occasionally with their less thoughtful sisters.

Can You Beat Them?

It will pay you to look up the values offered in Bremner's Fair announcement on page 5.

Official Word

A cable from London, Eng. on Sunday gave the official word that Capt. Eric Robertson, reported missing in July, was killed. The family had received word of his fate some weeks ago.

Transferred To Sarnia

Mr. W.E. Theaker, accountant at the Merchants Bank, has been transferred to Sarnia as accountant. This means a promotion for Mr Theaker. His successor here is Mr M. V. Buffam of Owen Sonud.

From Sunny California

Mr. William Adamson, the well-known tile man is away off in Pomona, California, where he has been living the past year but "Billy's", heart is back in old Walkerton just now, judging by the nice cheque for ten dollars that came along to swell the Red Cross funds last Thursday.

Pioneers Of Bentinck

Two pioneers of Bentinck Township were buried at Durham on Monday, Mrs. R. Fletcher, aged 70, of con. 2, leaves one son and seven daughters. Mrs. Thomas Reay died at the home of her daughter in Durham, Mrs. Wm. Johnston, and two sons and five daughters survive. She was born in Bentinck Township 75 years ago and spent most of her life there.

Doing Her Bit

A Walkerton lady who is "doing her bit" at home while her husband is at the Front is Mrs. Joseph Wallace. Besides being very active in patriotic work in which she is deeply interested, Mrs. Wallace went heart and soul into the greater production effort last spring, planting a very large garden. Her potato crop has just been taken up and yielded no less than sixty-six bags of tubers.

Fell With Burning Lamp

Mrs. Theron Lundy of Brant had a narrow escape one night last week when she fainted with a burning lamp in her hand. The lamp fell at her feet and burst into a blaze but fortunately her young nephew, Harry, was on hand and pluckily extinguished the blaze. Mrs. Lundy had got up out of bed to give her nephew medicine and had he not come to her rescue she would no doubt have lost her life. As it was, her foot was badly burned and blood poisoning set in but this has been checked.

$1600 for Red Cross.

The Red Cross figures for Walkerton will run about $1600. This is about a hundred dollars more than last year. Sec. H. G. Hunter is holding the lists for a few days before handing them in to the newspapers for publication, so that any citizen who were out of town on Thursday, or have not yet contributed have an opportunity to do so. The largest subscription was $35 and the smallest 10c. The High School pupils gave $30.05 and the Public School pupils $23.00. The Canvassers report that their work was easy in comparison with previous years. Most citizens had their money ready when the canvassers called and arguments to convince the people of the importance of the work were quite unnecessary.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

WHY not give the pork-packers a dose of their own medicine, the double cure?

THAT old war horse, Sam. Hughes, refers to the reorganized Cabinet as the National Trust Government.

NO need for the Food Controller to fix the price of potatoes now. The large crop will settle the high prices. The time for him to act was last spring when speculators were charging $5. a bag for seed potatoes.

TWO farmers were in the police court at Woodstock for delivering milk into which 23 per cent of water had been dumped. In mitigation of judgment the Newmarket, Express-Herald suggests that, the pump-handles having gone up, the farmers had to "get even" in some way.

IN connection with the Red Cross Campaign, it is noted that in most towns the Council contributes some share of the givings, often a very large portion. In this way every tax-payer gives something and citizens who wish to be generous can give as much as they like. The scheme is a good one and we would like to see the Walkerton Council follow the example of other towns and dig down in the municipal jeans. The need for Red Cross funds is greater than ever and Walkerton can easily afford to do a bit better than she has done.

THE Journal of Commerce, edited by Hon. W. S Fielding, points out that Union Government was desired for (1) the stoppage of party strife; (2) the avoidance of elections, by an extension of the parliamentary term; (3) the uniting of the Canadian people into one party for all purposes during the war. Mr. Fielding says that a moment's reflection will show the reader that not one of these purposes can now be effected by the formation of the Union Government. It does not indicate a union of the whole Canadian people. Mr Fielding adds significantly, that "the very personnel of the new administration makes it clear that differences which unhappily have arisen are now much accentuated. So it is too clear that the good purposes for which most people desired a Union Government are not attained by the recent appointments to Parliament."

LAST year the towns and villages of Bruce County gave 83 cents per head of population to the British Red Cross, while the townships gave 44 cents per capita. In other words the towns, with a population half as great, gave as much altogether as the townships. We don't believe this is due to lack of generosity on the part of the farmers. Rather it is due to the difficulty of making a canvass in the rural sections and to the fact that the matter is not properly brought before the township Councils. Everybody knows that in Bruce County the predominating wealth is in the farming communities and the townships are able to give liberally. If strong deputations of ratepayers would wait upon their township councils with the object of making the grants on the basis of $1 her head of population for the British Red Cross, they would likely get it and it would be more creditable to the townships than what they gave last year.

IN a letter to the Farmer's Advocate a "Farmer's Wife" from Bruce County, upbraids the Education for introducing Art as a compulsory subject in the Public Schools at a time when help is so much needed on the farm. She says that in her section, three pupils in the Senior Fourth have to repeat their year because they couldn't pass in Art. Instead of giving a little much needed help at time, the children have to spend their Saturdays hunting for worms to see how many legs they have and such like. The present Educational authorities have always overemphasized fads and unessentials at the expense of the "three R's" and, war or no war, they continue sticking on more and more frills. Both Art and Nature Study are useful but not the most important subjects. The holding back of pupils because they can't draw is one of the stupidest features of the whole School system. Many a bright boy, lacking in ability to draw, has had his whole life course changed because he was plucked in drawing. Some people who should know, claim that our Educational System, which at one time was spoken of as the best in the world, is now not far from the worst.

LETTER OF SYMPATHY.

Mrs. John McPhail of Otter Creek, had a nice thoughtful letter of sympathy on Friday from Lieut.-Col. Price, the commanding officer of the 20th Batt'n, the unit with which her son, Pte. Dan McPhail crossed to England. Lieut.-Col. Price writes:–

Please let me give you my sympathy in the loss of No. 237,336 Dan McPhail formerly of the 204th Beavers but latterly of the 3rd Batt'n in France. It was a pleasure for me to command men like Pte. McPhail. The Beavers made a name for themselves through just such men and when they were broken up they carried to the new units in France that valor which helps to win the war. All Canada appreciates the sacrifice the women of Canada are making. God bless them. Your sacrifice is great but you are not alone and you can thus bear it in company with others. If you are in Toronto any time Mrs Price of 7 Indian Grove will be glad to see you and you might be able to go to one of the 204th auxiliary meetings. It will help you. May God give you strength to see the way through your cloud of sorrow.

Yours faithfully
William H. Price, Lt.-Col.

ON GUARD AT THE READING GATE!

It is a fine thing to guard our homes against alien soldiers of whose purposes we are all aware. But it is also very important to guard them against other insidious foes that creep in under the disguise of friendly entertainers to plunder and destroy the cherished ideals, the lofty standard, the clear views that have given the home its character.

If you will familiarize your young people with the best reading, they will not be likely to crave what is inferior and demoralizing. The Youth's Companion is a powerful influence in awakening a taste for what is best in reading. It is on guard at the reading gate! Nothing cheap, mean or hateful passes its challenge. But neither does the crabbed and dull austere. Cheery idealism is The Companion's countersign. Put it on guard at your reading gate!

The Companion is $2.25 a year. If you do not know it, by all means send for sample copies giving a Forecast of what the next volume will bring.

Our offer includes, for $2.25:

1. The Youth's Companion—52 issues of 1918.
2. All the remaining issues of 1917.
3. The Companion Home Calendar for 1918.

Lesson IV.—Fourth Quarter, For Oct. 28, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, Ez. viii, 21-32. Memory Verses, 21, 22—Golden Text, Ez. viii, 22—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

Some time after the rebuilding and dedication of the temple, as in the last lesson, Ezra and his company returned to Jerusalem with wonderful favors from the king of Persia because of the good hand of his God upon him and because of the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, on which, like David, he had set his affection (I Chron. xxix, 3). In these two chapters, vii and viii, the house of God, or the house of the Lord, is mentioned at least twelve times, and some name of God—such as the God of heaven, the God of Israel, the God of Jerusalem, the God of our fathers or the Lord God—at least thirty-five times. The hand of God is mentioned in vii, 6, 9, 28; viii, 18, 22, 31, so that our hearts must surely be stayed on Jehovah in this, as in every Bible study. The whole book is given to us that we may know God, the only living and true God, and trust Him and live for Him, as Ezra did. To us He is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, but ever the same and always looking for hearts that are whole toward Him (II Chron. xvi, 9).

As to Ezra, he was a ready scribe in the law of Moses and had prepared his heart to seek and to do and to teach in Israel the law of the Lord and His statutes and judgments (vii, 6, 10). I do not know how much my own life has been affected by Him, but I certainly am glad that for over forty years I have given my life to seeking to know God as revealed in His word and to help others to know Him, and His hand has manifestly been upon us for good, and increasingly so as the years go by. The favor of God toward Ezra through the king and his counselors is a magnificent showing of the power of Him who can turn the hearts of kings to strengthen the hands of His servants in His work (Ezra vi, 22; Prov. xxi, 1). Note the silver and the gold so freely given for the house of God and for sacrifices, with authority to draw on the king's treasure house for whatsoever more might be needed and freedom to use all as seemed good according to the will of God (vii, 12-20). Then the decree to the treasurers beyond the river to give to Ezra silver, wheat, wine and oil and salt without limit and exemption from all toll or tribute, that the God of heaven might be honored and made known to those who knew Him not (vii, 21-26).

We do not wonder that Ezra blessed the Lord God of his fathers for so influencing the king's heart to honor the God of Israel before all his counselors and mighty princes (vii, 27, 28). The company of all who were willing to go with Ezra to Jerusalem having assembled at the river of Ahava, he caused the people to fast and pray that God would show them the right way for themselves, their little ones and their substance, he being ashamed to ask the king for an escort of soldiers and horsemen to help against the enemy in the way, since he had said to the king, "The hand of our Lord is upon all them for good that seek Him" (viii, 21-23).

Having fasted and prayed and having an assurance from God that He would care for them (verse 23), he put the silver and gold and the vessels in the special care of twelve of the chief of the priests, the gold and silver alone, without the vessels, being equal to about $3,500,000, assuring them that all was holy unto the Lord and charging them to watch and keep all until delivered safely in Jerusalem (viii, 24-30). They were four months on the journey, but the hand of God was upon them all the way, and He delivered them from the hand of the enemy and of such as lay in wait by the way, and they reached Jerusalem in safety (vii, 9; viii, 31, 32). On the fourth day after reaching Jerusalem all the treasure was safely handed over and then they manifested their gratitude by sacrificing burnt offerings (viii, 33-35).

It would seem to many a very presumptuous thing to take such a journey with such a company (perhaps 2,000 people) and so much wealth, with enemies by the way, without an armed escort, even though they had fasted and prayed and committed themselves to the Lord, but Ezra knew the Lord as few know Him in our day, and God honored his faith. So many cannot trust Him to care for the work He has entrusted to them, but dishonor Him by appealing to His enemies to help them carry on the work and by entering into all sorts of worldly alliances in so called Christian work. This was somewhat the condition of things in Jerusalem on the arrival of Ezra and his company, and to such a man of God it was heartbreaking. The people of God, led on by their princes and rulers, had joined in affinity with the people of the land and their abominations, and when Ezra learned of it he fell upon his knees and wept sore and spread all the trouble before the Lord (ix, 1-6, 13-15; x, 1-5). The Lord heard his cry and inclined the people to be willing to put away the wrong, and there was a great purification and separation unto the Lord. If we would be wholly for God we must honestly pray, "Search me, O God, and know my heart, try me and know my thoughts and see if there be any way of pain or grief in me and lead me in the way everlasting" (Ps. cxxxix, 23, 24, margin). We must walk before God and be sincere (Gen. xvii, 1).

WHERE A DAY IS FOUR DAYS LONG

Picture taken 12.15 a.m., June 22nd, from White Pass and Yukon route steamer "Casca," on Yukon River at Fort Yukon.

IN Alaska there is a time when a day is four days long. From the 19th to 22nd of June, inclusive, the sun does not set. It is because of this that the vast country on the northwest of the American continent is called "The Land of the Midnight Sun." It fills one with strange thrills to be in the midst of an open country at midnight and then see old Sol look at you with a sleepy eye that peeps just above the horizon.

The far famed loveliness of Alaska is an invitation to the tourist to visit it. Thousands go there annually. Transportation facilities are convenient. Some travel thousands of miles to see this region, but the invigorating atmosphere, the endless variety of mountain, river, lake, waterfall, forest and glacier scenery compensate well for the journey. On many of the plains and valleys the vegetation is rich, and excellent crops are raised.

The voyage along the Pacific coast from Vancouver to Skagway is delightful. The Canadian Pacific runs an excellent service of passenger vessels on this route. Last summer I took the trip. A White Pass and Yukon Route train brought me from Skagway to the town of White Horse on the Yukon River. There I boarded the steamer "Casca" and took a trip into the heart of the country. There were about fifty tourists on the boat. It was the 21st of June, and we were all anticipating the experience of gazing on the sun at midnight. Nearly everybody had a camera in readiness. At 11 o'clock p.m. we were near Fort Yukon, and Sol then appeared to be a little clouded, but it was plain daylight. At midnight the Lord of Light had brushed away the clouds and appeared more like the full moon than the sun we know in Canada. We took many photographs of him as he climbed higher on the stairs of heaven and arrayed himself in his brightest sheen.

As we sailed along the banks of the Yukon River we saw some bears and moose patrol the wilds, and the huskies—or big Alaskan dogs that draw the sleighs in the winter—kept the air busy in carrying the sounds of their barking to our ears. Each homesteader keeps a little herd of these dogs, and they are as useful to him as horses are to the residents of other countries. We continued our course until we were well inside the Arctic Circle, and while there we did not feel the necessity for heavy overcoats.

Huskies in an Alaskan village.

The population of Alaska embraces Eskimos and Indians, but it is by the large influx of white settlers that the country is being developed. Lumbering and mining are the principal industries, and they are carried on with profit. The United States paid $7,200,000 to the Russian Government for Alaska, and the bargain seems to have been a good one for the purchasers, for in recent years, immense quantities of gold and other minerals, fish, furs and timber have been produced in the country.

The making of railways is proceeding. Alaska is likely to become a sphere of considerable business activity. For the hunter and tourist the place holds a thousand charms. It is enchanting to look on at all times, but it appears at its best in June when it has that wonderful day of 96 hours in length. J. C. B. B.

FRASER STUDIO

CURIOUS INDIAN ROCK PAINTINGS

MANY a mystery remains to be solved concerning the Indian in his earliest stages of tribal existence. Especially is this so regarding the rock paintings, or the crude art known as petrography, some fine specimens of which are to be seen on the Banff-Windermere Road, south of Golden, B.C., on the C. P. R.

It is thought that these aboriginal picture drawings succeeded an earlier sign language, though picture writing is of a very ancient date, as from it came the graphic systems of Egypt, Assyria, and China. On the American continent, the Aztecs, were picture writers and rock painters. The art, if it may be so termed, is related to that of the Indian picture signs drawn on the tent or tepee, or upon tree bark or animal skins.

Some of the rock drawings still traceable on this continent can be interpreted, but many others await translation, as do the signs of the Hittite language of the past. Schoolcraft, the Indian authority, speaks of the pictographic work of the Ojibways, which he specially studied. The entire system is a symbolic one, as no doubt was the case with the Windermere examples here illustrated. Figurative signs were made to interpret their magic medicines or features of their nature religion, while hunting and war songs are also included in the list of pictures. The Iroquois, Hurons and Algonquins have left evidences of their petrography as important events were recorded on stone, bark and skin. The ancient painter, with nothing but his fingers and paint pots, was held in as high esteem as the medicine man.

The second illustration here shown deals with the splendid specimens found on the great Missanoga Rock, on the lake of that name, ten miles north of Kaladar station of the C. P. R., in Ontario. These come out very clear when wet, the dull red hematite then showing a remarkable clearness. Many objects may be here studied, such as a man on horseback, a canoe with a man standing in it, a moose and a dog and a tree, suggesting a hunting scene. It is thought they may form records of olden battles fought between the Algonquins or Hurons of the north and the Iroquois of the south.

One would like the curtain of time to be rolled back long enough to see the bronzed artist of long ago at work, and to learn from him something of the significance of his gallery of rock paintings that now baCs his successor, the pale face.

Exemption Tribunals.

Exemption Boards have been chosen in such a way as to make them absolutely independent and removed from all influence. There are over 1,250 boards throughout the country, each composed of two men, one appointed by the county judge in the district concerned and one selected by a joint committee of Parliament. Being familiar with local conditions where they sit, the members are well-fitted to appreciate such reasons for exemption as are put before them by men called up.

Exemption will be granted to those who can establish that it is in the national interest that they remain in civilian life. This is for the Exemption Board to decide after having received full information in each case.

The grounds on which exemption may be claimed (which are similar to the grounds recognized in Great Britain and the United States) are as follows:—

(a) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in Military Service, be engaged in other work in which he is habitually engaged.

(b) That it is expedient in the national interest that the man should, instead of being employed in Military Service, be engaged in other work in which he wishes to be engaged and for which he has special qualifications.

(c) That it is expedient in the national interest that, instead of being employed in Military Service, he should continue to be educated or trained for any work for which he is then being educated and trained.

(d) That serious hardship would ensue if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position.

(e) Ill health or infirmity.

(f) That he conscientiously objects to the undertaking of combatant service and is prohibited from doing so by tenets and articles of faith, in effect on the sixth day of July, 1917, of any organized religious denomination existing and well recognized in Canada at such date, and to which he in good faith belongs.

(g) That he should be exempt because disfranchised under the War Time Election Act.

No Claim for Exemption should be put forward unless one or other of these grounds in fact exists, and no loyal citizen should assist in, or allow himself to be made a party to, any Claim for Exemption unless thoroughly satisfied that it is made in good faith.

Exemption may be applied for by the men selected themselves or by their parents, near relatives or employers. Application for exemption must be made on printed forms to be found at every post office, which are to be filled in and left with the postmaster if exemption is desired. The postmaster will forward the form to a Registrar, who will send it to the appropriate Exemption Board. In due time, then, the Applicant will get notice as to when he must present his case before the Board.

Still Hold The Cup

Cargill challenged the Walkerton Bowling Club for the Keystone Trophy last week and made an unsuccessful effort to lift it at the Green last Wednesday afternoon. With an icy blast blowing across the lawn and the players with heavy winter overcoats, they looked more like a polar expedition than bowlers on pleasure bent. The score was 23—13. The Walkerton defenders were:—C. H. Rogers, N. Hincas, W. H. McBurney, A. McNab, skip.

POETS' CORNER

THE VACANT CHAIR

Editor Wm. McDonald of the Chesley Enterprise has written a "pome" about the banishing of the Editor Art Wesley from the Council table which we reproduce herewith:—

We will meet, but we will miss him
There will be one vacant chair,
And the quartette will be happy
If Art Wesley is not there.

Put hot notes on legislation
Made by donkeys young and old,
Will be in the Times and Herald
Written in its language bold.

Just inside the door sits Artie
Oh, but it is lots of fun!
Watching Bob (the Reeve) and Sandy,
McKinnon and Dad Sanderson!

And he beams upon Mayor Johnston
Barber Andy jolly boy,
Vogan, Truax and McGregor
He will try to bring them joy.

But the four who did expel him
They frown on him as they pass
Just because in his big paper [redacted]
He compared them to an ass.

When elections come, he'll get them
From that Chamber out they'll go.
When the voters mark their ballots
They will lay this quartette low.

In the council of the New Year
No more donkeys will you see
For the eight will be war horses
And no braying there will be.

News About Town

Inspector Lays Charges

Inspector White has had his eye skinned for farmers who have been getting in big shipments of liquor by express and who in some cases are suspected of selling or turning it over to some one else to dispose of. On Tuesday the Inspector had four Bruce farmers up before Magistrates Tolton and Richardson charged with violating the Ontario Temperance Act. Archibald Bell of Kincardine had an auto smash-up while intoxicated and as a result, paid $25 and costs for being drunk on the public highway and $10 and costs for driving a car while he was the worse of liquor. Robt. Osborne, a Greenock farmer, got a shipment of 24 bottles of booze and in two weeks it had all disappeared. The authorities were of the opinion that Osborne must have had assistance in consuming the fiery fluid. The case will be argued out on Friday. Duncan Curry of Bruce Tp. who got in a large shipment was also up for trial. Curry drove into Knox's Hotel sheds at Pinkerton on his way home from the station with the booze and this, according to Attorney Klein, is an offence, which may result in a second charge being laid against Curry. Decision on this case was deferred. Alex. Russel of Greenock another farmer, who is alleged to have been buying booze freely, will also be up for trial Friday at 1.30. O. E. Klein prosecuted for the License Dept., A. E. McNab for Russel, Curry and Osborne, and Lawyer Stewart of Kincardine for Bell.

WHICH MAN IS BETTER OFF?

A famous American weekly paper asks in one of its editorials this week, which of two men is better off: the man with one hundred dollars in his pocket or the man with a one hundred dollar American war loan bond in the bank. The writer concludes that the man with the bond is the more fortunate, first because his capital is quite as safe if not safer than the $100 bill since the government is the backer of both and the bond, if destroyed, might be replaced whereas the bill could not: second, because the bond is earning money and the bill is not: and third, because the bond-owner has learned to invest, is a partner in his own government's business enterprises and has made at least this one step on the road to saving up a competence.

In November we Canadians are to have a chance to convert all our spare money, from $50 up, into Canadian Victory Loan bonds. What the American journal says is true of the American with an American bond, is doubly true of the Canadian with a Canadian bond. No Canadian will for an instant admit that there could be any safer security than one which is guaranteed by the "bond" of the Canadian people backed by all Canada's wealth. And as for profit, it needs no argument that 5½% is much better than four per cent. which our American contemporary calls good.

THE MOST FAMOUS WOMAN.

An Interesting Question That Is Hard to Answer.

At first the question asked itself: "Why should we be requested to name the most famous woman in history?" But our inward consciousness immediately answered: "Why not? Is not the request of a reader that you do so the most flattering tribute imaginable to your judgment? Paris was called upon to decide a dispute as to which of three goddesses was the most beautiful. Now if you had been asked to declare which of all the women of history was the loveliest appearing!"

With a sigh of immense relief we settled down to turn the pages of "Famous Women of History" (if that was the title).

Since fame has been made the test we must reject looks, behavior, and personal achievement. It were easier to settle pre-eminence by taking those things into account. A model efficiency chart could then be made out and percentages carefully assigned, somewhat on this order:

Personal appearance	30
Achievement	30
Disposition	10
Influence over husband	10
Influence over others	10
Fame	10
Total	100

There are so many things that cannot be crowded in 100 per cent. that no pretence is made of justice in this apportioning. It is doubtful if man can do justice to woman, anyway.

Still, under some arrangement on this order, headway could be made. Helen would score heavily as to personal appearance; assuming that Helen was a historic person. Cleopatra, whose disposition was heavily minus, is tolerably famous. Jane Austen and George Eliot should receive the full 30 per cent. for achievement. And as for influence over the menfolks, wasn't it George III.'s mother who used to exhort him to "Be a man, George!"

Achievement would have to be counted indirectly as well as directly. There was Klara Wieck, who made Robert Schumann sing. The mother of the Gracchi raised her boys to be soldiers, and not only were they notable fighters, but the younger, Tiberius, helped the small farmer before Mr. Lloyd George.

It is useless to consider on the score of fame Mme. De Stael or La Pompadour or George Sand. They had their power and their day. Both are over. But a fame like Florence Nightingale's endures and grows. Some very famous women are totally obscure—the Dark Lady of the Sonnets, for example. And who were Robert Herrick's loves that inspired some brief lyrics which are green and fresh blossomed after almost three centuries? Were we not bound to history, could we turn to the pages of fiction, the floodgates would be opened. There are more famous women in fable than ever existed in fact.

Perhaps the most famous woman of history was the Maid of France.

The Phantom Sniper.

All sorts of things are happening in the Great War, not only in connection with the actual fighting—over the details of which, of course, a veil must often be cast—but on the human side. In the Wide World, under the title of "Strange Stories of the War," appears a selection of some of these little incidents contributed by readers in connection with a competition which is interesting every Britisher now fighting in the trenches. Here is one out of the half-dozen published. At a certain place on the British front a solitary German sniper caused scores of casualties among our men, says the writer, and try as they would our scouts failed to locate him. Once three men of the Worcesters went out one night to seek him; they never returned. Later, three men of the Manchesters departed on the same errand; they were also reported "missing." Another battalion commander, at the man's earnest request, allowed his best scout to go out single-handed, but nothing more was heard of him. At last, when the "phantom sniper" had become quite famous, a keen-eyed sentry reported that he thought he had an idea where Mr. Boche was lurking, and permission was sought for a party to go out and bag him. "No," said the C.O. "We've lost quite enough good men on that game; we'll make a proper job of him this time." The rifle-flashes that the observant sentry had detected were watched for, the position surveyed by the airmen, and other measures taken that need not be described. Then, at an agreed-upon hour, a gun of a British battery fired one shell, and one only. Later on, as nothing had been heard of Mr. Sniper in the interval, a reconnoitring party went over to investigate. They found that the solitary shell had registered a magnificent bull right in the centre of the sniper's little eyrie, dug in the side of a shell-crater in "No Man's Land" and most cunningly concealed. Mr. Sniper was blown to pieces, but they discovered his rifle and his store of food and ammunition. Some distance off they also located the bodies of the three Worcesters, the three Manchesters, and other victims of the concealed marksman's skill.

Jane Austen's Cottage.

Chawton Cottage is to have a memorial tablet commemorating the centenary of Jane Austen. Though it was only after 1809 that Miss Austen removed to Chawton, the cottage certainly deserves a tablet, for it was there that she wrote "Emma" and "Persuasion," retrieved "Northanger Abbey" from the Bath bookseller to whom she had sold it for £10, and revised it, as well as "Sense and Sensibility" and "Pride and Prejudice." It is easy to imagine the the busy writer in the quiet country house, undisturbed except for occasional visitors, when a handkerchief would promptly be thrown on the manuscripts, as a hasty preventive to idle questions.

WHEN SHRAPNEL BURSTS.

Time Fuse Causes Balls to Scatter In Air.

The dictionary defines shrapnel as "a shell filled with bullets and having a bursting charge to explode it at any time in its flight." This definition is credited to a British officer, but, while accurate, is somewhat misleading.

So much for what a shrapnel is. What a shrapnel is is clouded by even more general misunderstanding. Consulting the dictionary again, we note that the shrapnel carries a bursting charge to explode it, and the general belief is that this charge, carried in the powder pocket in the base of the casing, shatters the steel shell and scatters the charge of shrapnel bullets, says Reginald Trautschold in Popular Mechanics.

On firing a gun loaded with shrapnel, the cartridge case is left behind, just as is the shell when discharging an ordinary shotgun. The complete shrapnel, with its time fuse, etc., is projected at a high rate of velocity, revolving rapidly in its flight, and travels as a unit until such instant as the flash from the fuse reaches the powder pocket. When ignition of the powder charge occurs, the diaphragm, separating the powder pocket from the section containing the shrapnel balls, is driven forward. This strips the fuse body from the end of the shell casing, while the forward travel of the casing is seriously retarded, if not arrested, or reversed. On issuing from the casing, the diaphragm plows through the mass of shrapnel balls and scatters them in all directions, the rosin which bound them together having been melted by the heat of the explosion and the friction created in driving the collection of shrapnel and partly melted rosin from the shrapnel casing.

The blasts of the gases formed by the explosion of the powder charge on issuing from the open end of the casing scatters the shrapnel still farther and imparts to the balls a velocity which makes them very destructive within a radius of about 60 feet of where the shrapnel "breaks." After the break of a shrapnel, the head of the projectile continues in advance, with a certain accelerated speed, followed by the diaphragm powder tube, etc., and the spread of scattering shrapnel. The casing, having lost much of its momentum, drops to the ground.

A shrapnel which breaks properly during flight simply scatters shrapnel balls, not fragments and pieces of jagged shell such as fly from an exploding high-explosive shell. When a shrapnel, through failure of the time fuse to respond, does not explode until it comes in contact with the ground or some other firm object in its path, then, and only then, the steel shell is fractured and pieces scattered in all directions. Damage frequently described as flying pieces of shrapnel casings, therefore, is more probably correctly to be ascribed to fragments of high-explosive shells.

Artists in War.

What can the artist do for his country in war time? What has he done in the countries now at war? In what direction can he exert his maximum of efficiency? For what work is he especially equipped?

Through my connection, as American secretary, with the Topul aux Artistes—an organization that has been helping the needy artists of Paris by providing cheap meals for them in studios loaned for that purpose—I have been kept in close and constant touch with what the art-workers have been doing in France. Even before I left that country, in the fourth month of the Great War, the artists were actively organized.

At the very outbreak of hostilities the younger artists and the students at the Beaux-Arts took their assigned places in the ranks of the youth of France, and shared the horrors of the first few months of war with such fine self-sacrifice and with such spirit and ardor that I have among my papers a single list of three hundred and fifty of them killed in action.

Many distinguished themselves on the field of battle; many were "gassed" or wounded; many have come back physical and mental wrecks after long periods in the hospitals.

Two artists of the Appui were among those who acted as eclaireurs for what was probably the most deadly volley of artillery ever fired. "At Verdun, when the Fort de Vaux was cut off from the main French body by German cross-fire," writes a friend in Paris, "the situation of the garrison became hopeless and Reynal capitulated. The Germans seemed to think that, with Vaux fallen, Verdun was in their power. They prepared a triumphal advance in force. Platoon after platoon, regiment after regiment, rolled out of their trenches, formed in close order under their standards and began to sweep onward, cheering and singing, with their music at their head. Two men of the Appui helped to signal the right moment for the French guns to open. Those who saw it say that a great cloud of dust rose to an enormous height, hiding everything from view, and when it settled no living thing could be seen. — From "Special Service for Artists in War Time," by Ernest Peixotto.

Japan Likes the Moon.

"Japanese fondness for moon-gazing must not be interpreted as a pure feeling of joy in the presence of beauty; it is mixed with melancholy sentiment," says the New East. "The soul is touched with strange and deep pathos when looking at the moon with night sky as a background and silence. Shirakawa had the idea when he said: 'As I, in solitude, look attentively upon the moon, I seem to merge into oneness with her.' This attitude toward nature quite differs from that which one feels at sight of the first touch of day as a spot of high light upon the top of Mount Fuji."—East and West News.

Brussels Founded in Roman Days

AT the point where the old Roman road from Tournai to Cologne crossed the little river of Senne, a tributary of the Scheldt, in what was, in Roman days, Northwestern Gaul, there early sprang up a village, and, although it is not certain, it seems likely that it was called Broeksele, the village on the marsh or brook. It was an inevitable place for a settlement. All the traffic of the countryside would follow the Roman highway, and what better place to end a day's journey, or from which to fare forth on one, than the village by the ford in the Valley of the Senne? So Broeksele grew steadily in size and importance. The old chroniclers of the eighth century make special mention of it; whilst, in the tenth century, it had come so much into favor that the Emperor Otto I. is said to have endowed there the Church of St. Gudule. Thereafter, Brussels, for so, perhaps, the town may now be called, figured ever more prominently in the affairs of the times hereabouts. It became a place of trade and a place of guilds, and a place much favored with those special charters which were matters of such high concern to the cities of the Middle Ages. In fact, it was one of the chief cities in the Duchy of Brabant, and the Dukes of Brabant, who had their capital at Louvain, looked with steadily increasing favor on the city on the Senne. Thus Duke John II. granted the citizens a special charter in 1312; whilst the famous charter drawn up in 1354, known in history as La Joyeuse Entree, and sworn to by Duke Wenceslaus and his Duchess Jeanne on the occasion of their state entry into Brussels, became the model for other provinces and the bulwark of the liberties of the Netherlands.

Duke Wenceslaus did much for Brussels. In 1357, he ordered a new wall to be constructed round it, embracing a much larger area than the old one, and some years after it was completed, the capital of Brabant was transferred from Louvain to Brussels, whilst the city entered upon a new era of prosperity. The times were turbulent, of course, and the history of most cities in these regions is largely occupied with the tales of how the citizens fought with their rulers to secure new privileges, or to maintain those already secured. Brussels was no exception. In 1420 the citizens demanded and obtained a further charter granting them additional privileges, and so uncertain were the times that it was some years after Brussels had been raised to the position of a capital city that the Dukes of Brabant could so far trust themselves among their turbulent subjects as to live there. It was their custom, about this time, to live in the stronghold of Vilvorde, which lay midway between Brussels and Louvain, and from there endeavor to maintain order in both cities. Later on, however, they built for themselves at Brussels a great castle, on the Claudenberg Hill, which is practically the site of the Place Royale and the king's palace to-day. The castle became famous in later years, as the Palace of the Netherlands, and it was here that Charles V. signed his abdication in 1555.

In the sixteenth century, a historian of the time described Brussels as "one of the finest, largest, and best-situated cities, not only of Brabant but of the whole of Europe." It, of course, shared to the full the troubles of the next two hundred years, the campaigns of Louis XIV. in the seventeenth century, and the vast back-and-forth struggle of the later Napoleonic wars, in the early days of the nineteenth. It was at Brussels, too, that the great revolt broke out against the Dutch, in 1830, which resulted in Belgium becoming a separate kingdom. The modern Brussels has little of the old town left. The walls have been long since swept away, and the city has spread itself out over the hills west of the valley, whilst its citizens, in the days just before the war, numbered nearly 700,000.

Modern Torture Refined.

Torture of a more refined nature has been employed upon prisoners in recent years, says The Manchester Guardian. Prince Kropotkin tells how the revolutionary Karakozoff was kept awake for a week at a time, guards sitting on either side of him, to stir him up when he showed signs of falling asleep. The unhappy man at last acquired the art of swinging his leg while he slept, so as to delude his guards that he was awake, but they detected the trick. As a result of this treatment Karakozoff, when he was at last led out for execution, was in such a state of collapse that it seemed as though his body did not contain a bone unbroken, and the rumor ran that his jailers had killed him in his cell and brought out an india rubber doll for the scaffold. Kropotkin himself spent some unhappy years in the fortress in the 70's. The floor and five-foot thick walls were alike covered with felt, so that the silence became unbearable. Kropotkin, however, had a happier lot than some, for he was permitted, at the request of the Geographical Society of Russia, to continue his work on the glacial period. Pens and ink were provided for his use by special permission of the Czar, but they could be used only up to the hour of sunset, which in a Russian winter is 3 o'clock.

A scheme that has been proposed for the protection of vessels from torpedo attack consists of a shower of whirling disks shot from special guns, which will turn the nose of the approaching torpedo.

NOTED MUSICIAN OF MONTREAL

Advises The Use Of "FRUIT-A-TIVES", The Famous Fruit Medicine.

MR. ROSENBURG
589 Casgrain St., Montreal.
April 20th, 1915.

"In my opinion, no other medicine in the world is so curative for Constipation and Indigestion as "Fruit-a-tives". I was a sufferer from these complaints for five years, and my sedentary occupation, Music, brought about a kind of Intestinal Paralysis—with nasty Headaches, belching gas, drowsiness after eating, and Pain in the Back. I tried pills and medicines of physicians, but nothing helped me. Then I was induced to try "Fruit-a-tives", and now for six months I have been entirely well.

I advise any one who suffers from that horrible trouble—Chronic Constipation with the resultant Indigestion, to try "Fruit-a-tives", and you will be agreeably surprised at the great benefit you will receive". A. ROSENBURG.

GREENOCK GORE

It makes one think winter is fast approaching when you see the snow falling.

Mrs. Scott Webb and daughter are spending a few days in Wingham.

Mr. Dave McIntosh is visiting his brother-in-law, Mr. William Gilchrist on the 2nd of Bruce.

The Red Cross meeting held in Mr. Neil McFarlane's shoe shop on Tuesday evening was well attended. Mr. R. J. Nesbitt and W. J. McKeeman were appointed to canvas this district. They report everybody quite willing to help along the good cause.

Mrs. Joseph Armstrong and son, Edgar of St. Catherines visited her friend, Mrs. Thomas Percy, on Wednesday and Thursday.

Mr. Archie Bell had what might have proved a serious accident, when his auto turned turtle while travelling along the highway in front of Mr. Wm. Moffatt's farm on the 12th of Greenock.

The beef rings are almost all closed for the season. Mr. A. Kirktown purposes holding a meeting on Oct. 29th to wind up the business of the Glamis ring.

Miss Mabel and Mr. Emerson Stewart Sundayed at Mr. George Webb's.

Miss Akitt of Narva spent Sunday in Glamis.

HANOVER

The little three-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Norman Litt wandered away from his home about noon one day last week and a search among the neighbors failed to locate him. His parents became greatly alarmed and a search party was instituted and as a result the little fellow was found at the home of Mr. Charles Glauser of Brant township.

MILDMAY

Mr. Fred Wells of Clifford spent Sunday with Dr. and Mrs. Doering.

The ladies of the W. J. K. C. are planning to hold a box social in the near future and are preparing a fine program.

Rev Mosig of New Hamburg conducted the services in the Lutheran church on Sunday, Oct. 21st in the afternoon. He was pastor of this church sometime ago and his many friends were pleased to see him back.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Huhnstein, Miss Beadie Huhnstein and Mr. Ed. Wittich of Cargill spent Sunday with Mildmay friends.

Mr. Ed. Knechtel of Hanover was in town on Saturday.

Rev. Mr. Storey of Cargill conducted the anniversary services in the Methodist Church last Sunday and was greeted with large congregations both morning and evening. Mr. Storey was a former minister of this church and his fine sermons were a delight to his many old friends. The collections for the day amounted to $95.00.

Rev. A. W. Geild was in Cargill over Sunday taking Rev. Mr. Storey's place.

Mr. Aaron Stembler of con 4 spent Saturday with Wroxeter acquaintances.

Mr. Joseph Schickler has the contract for the concrete work of Liesemer and Kalbfleish's new garage.

CARGILL

Pte. Jack Anderson, who was sent home on leave from the Front on account of shell shock, was given a big public reception at Cargill on Tuesday evening of last week. The gathering was held under the auspices of the Brant Branch of the Bruce Preparedness League, in the Foresters Hall and the building was filled to its capacity. Mr. W. D. Cargill occupied the chair and Ptes. Jack Anderson, Lou. Anderson and Alex. Thompson, all returned soldiers, occupied seats on the platform. Pte. Jack Anderson was presented with a purse and with a parcel of Soldier's Comforts from the ladies organization. Pte. Anderson replied with a few appropriate words. An interesting feature was an informal talk by Pte. Lou. Anderson on the work that the boys have to do over in Flanders. It was given in modest soldier's style and thoroughly appreciated by the audience. Other speakers were:—Rev. R. M. Gale, Rev. Mr. Horner, Rev. H. B. Storey, Mr. Frank Rennie, Senator Donnelly, Mr. John Rowland, Reeve Willoughby. Rev. Mr. Gale strongly condemmed the profiteers. Canada, he thought was lacking in Leaders. He was glad to see Mr. N. W. Rowell entering the New Government, a man whom he respected a good deal. He criticized the government which urges economy, and allows immense quantities of grain to be used for the manufacture of liquor. Mr. John Rowland replying to Mr. Gale, took exception to some of his statments. Instead of consigning people to hell as Mr. Gale appeared to be doing with the profiteers, it was a minister s business to try to help people to something higher. Mr. Rowland claimed that rum was a great benefit on the firing line in the thick of battle. Mr. Frank Rennie, Chairmen of the Brant Preparedness League, criticized the make-up of the local conscription tribunal of what he himself is a member. Mr. Rennie said there should be one Catholic on the tribnnal and also that the returned soldiers should have been represented, mentioning Lou. Anderson and C. F. Nutting as likely men. Mr. Rennie hoped it might not yet be too late to remedy the mistake.

C. Kyle is spending a few days in Toronto looking into the coal situation, which is looking very serious just now. We hope he will manage to bring home a few cars with him.

Mr. Ross of Cargill Ltd. is away on a business trip.

Rev. H. B. Storey preached the anniversary services in Mildmay on Sunday.

Rev Guild of Mildmay preached in this circuit on Sunday and delivered splendid sermons.

Jos. Clancy shipped a carload of hogs on Tuesday.

BRANT AVENUE

"Hello there Telescope!" Here we are again on the job after being off on holidays for a week.

Lots of rain these times spose trying to make up for that dry spell in harvest time, here's looking for another few weeks of drier weather so that the farmers will get their fall work done up in good time.

That snow storm last Friday scared a good many farmers and made them think it near time the "murphys" were in the cellar as some crops are yielding very heavy, but other root crops are just fair.

Quite a few farmers on this Ave are busy picking their precious apple crop which is worth looking after especially this year.

Some of the young lads between 20 and 34 years of age called on the Harriston folks this week to find out what job they are best qualified for. Some returned home looking down-hearted having heard what their job will be. Cheer up boys and wear a smile and let the "Kaiser worry."

This is being Harry Denny's third weeks' work in this neighborhood trying to thresh the bumper crop and has near two more weeks' work to do as Henry Kunkel had over three days threshing alone. He will have lots of grain to feed all those hogs he has on hand for the market.

Cream hauling is slackening off for this season as Len. Long just makes three trips a week now.

At last our road work was completed on the lower end of the beat, and they also had a grant of $50 to help improve the 5th sideroad which needed graveling very bad.

Mr. Harvey Whitehead who has been working for his brother Benjamin near Cargill for the past few months spent a few days under the parental roof.

Some of the young lads were busy this Fall. One lad said he gathered ten bags of butternuts and another one has 7 and so on.

On Sunday afternoons many people out of town roam through the nearby woods searching for beechnuts which are very plentiful again this year. Rather a slow job shelling them. Lots of time in winter to do those jobs.

"As bad off as 25 years ago." As Mrs. Jack Lundy and daughter Emma have quit housekeeping here and have been working in the Pork & Bean Factory at Harriston the past few weeks, Jack has to do his own house-work now, but he thinks it's a whole lot easier to sit down and eat a meal ready to eat than make it himself. Don't worry, Jack, the cooks will likely be home for Xmas dinner anyhow.

Two large flocks of wild geese were seen heating it southward on Monday and on Tuesday another bunch of 80 big geese were going in the same direction. Old-time sayings used to predict a sudden cold spell after their flight. Let's hope the next flocks will go the opposite way and bring along six weeks of warm weather.

Mr. J. J. Zettler made a business trip to Wiarton last week looking after some cattle.

Some of the silo men have had much difficulty in getting their corn into their silos. Too much rain at cutting and filling time.

Culross Tp. Council

Town Hall, Teeswater, Oct. 15th 1917.

Council met on above date. Members of the Board all present except Thos. McPherson. The minutes of the last meeting were read and sustained.

A report was laid on the table by Jno. Armstrong re a grievance complained of on bounadry of Culross and Greenock. As for motion of last meeting I examined the location of the grievance on boundary and I found that stones had been piled on the road way in some places four feet high. I would recommend that the Reeve communicate with the Reeve of Greenock and have the obstruction removed. I also found a part of the road filled in and made use of for farming purposes. I think that the land so used should be paying a revenue to the Township.

Armstrong—Keffer—That as there has been complaint made that stone and gravel has been put in the creek crossing the road allowance at lot 17, con 10. That James Thompson be appointed to investigate and if he considers it an obstruction to have it removed.—Carried.

Thompson—Keffer—That as Mr. George McEvers has made complaint that the ditch on the roadside is filled up and drains the water back on his property. That John Armstrong be appointed to have the ditch cleaned out.—Carried.

Thompson—Armstrong—That as it has been customary for the ratepayers to pay their taxes at either banks and it was found to be unsatisfactory, that they pay either the collector or the Molsons Bank.—Carried.

Keffer—Thompson—That we grant one thousand dollars to the British Red Cross to be made payable Dec. 15th, 1917.—Carried.

Thompson—Armstrong—That the Clerk write to the engineer and find out the reason for his not coming to attend to the work here. If it is impossible for him to come to let us know as soon as possible.

The Finance report was then read and orders issued for payment of the accounts. The Council then adjourned to meet again on Monday, Nov. 12th or at the Call of the Reeve.

C. Button,
Clerk.

Communication was read from T. L. Squire, Municipal Adviser, re the abolition of Statute Labour. After some discussion it was laid over to next meeting for further considertion.

An appeal was received from the British Red Cross for funds to carry on their work. Laid over to next meeting.

Gilchrist—Symon—That this council do now adjourn to meet at Pinkerton on Monday, Nov. 26th, for general business.—Carried.

Thos. H. Purdy,
Clerk.

To Improve Party-Line Service

WE suggest consideration for the persons who may be talking on your party-line. Do not interrupt their conversation. It is discourteous and unfair.

1. Answer only your own signal. If there is any confusion about the rings, report the fact promptly to the Chief Operator.
2. When you wish to call, remove the receiver and listen. If the line is in use hang up the receiver and wait until the conversation is finished.
3. Do not allow children or others to listen on the line when it is in use or to play with the telephone at any time.
4. Make your calls as brief as possible. Short conversations will keep the line open and make the service of most value to everyone.

"Good service * * * our true intent."

"you mind and behave and don't come back yere without'n you bring a skelp!"

About 3 o'clock of the second day Pine remarked quietly:

"Thar they come!"

I was instantly by his side, and we strained our eyesight in an attempt to count the shifting figures. Pine's vision was better and more practiced than mine.

"They are all thar," said he, "and they're driving extry hosses."

Ten minutes later the cavalcade stopped, and the men dismounted wearily. They were, as the old man had said, driving before them a half dozen ponies, which Governor Boggs herded into the corral. Nobody said a word. One or two stretched themselves. Johnny seized a cup and took a long drink. Yank leaned his rifle against the wall. Old man Pine's keen, fierce eye had been roving over every detail, though he, too, had kept silent.

"Well, Old," he remarked, "I see you obeyed orders like a good sojer."

The boy grinned.

"Yes, dad," said he.

And then I saw what I had not noticed before—that at the belt of each of the tall, silent young backwoodsmen hung one or more wet, heavy, red and black soggy strips. The scalping had been no mere figure of speech. Thank heaven, none of our own people was similarly decorated!

So horrified and revolted was I at this discovery that I hardly roused myself to greet the men. I looked with aversion and yet with a certain fascination on the serene, clear features of these scalp takers. Yet, since in the days following this aversion could not but wear away in face of the simplicity and straightforwardness of the frontiersmen, I had to acknowledge that the atrocious deed was more a product of custom than of natural barbarity.

Though these Indian troubles had nothing to do with it, nevertheless they marked the beginning of our change of luck. We suffered no definite misfortunes, but these things did not go well. The slight malarial attack of Don Gaspar was the first of an annoying series. I suppose we had all been inoculated on the marshes of the Sacramento, and the disease had remained latent in our systems. The hard work in the open air had kept us healthy, but the fever only awaited the favorable moment of depression or of overwork. The combination of ice cold water around our legs and burning sun on our heads was not the best in the world. Fortunately Yank, who came from an ague country, had had foresight enough to bring a supply of quinine. For two months one or the other of us was ailing, and once for a few days five of us were down!

Then, too, I think the zest of the game was palling on us a little, strange as it may seem. We could dig gold from the soil almost at will. It would seem that this single fact would keep normally acquisitive men keyed to a high pitch of endeavor all the time, but it was not so. I suppose we needed a vacation. We began to discuss what we would do when we should see the city again. No one for a moment dreamed that we should quit these rich diggings. We were here to make our fortunes, and the fortunes seemed to be ready for the making. Only, the novelty having passed, it had become hard work, just like the making of any other kind of a fortune.

The Pine family camped below us, used our corral at our invitation and set placidly to work. They were typical frontiersmen and settled down in the well built cabin which they quickly ran up as though they meant to make of it a permanent home. For two months, which brought us up to the end of July, they lived a regular and leisurely life. Then one morning, without any warning at all, they rode over to our cabin, leading their horses, fully packed. Old man Pine explained, while his five tall, steady eyed sons sat their horses quite immobile in the background, that they had dug enough gold for their necessities, and that they were now going down to the lower country to pick out some good land. These men were the very first I happened to meet who had come into the country with a definite idea of settling.

After the departure of this strong force, began our discussions as to the safeguarding of our gold. It had now reached a very considerable sum—somewhere near $35,000, as I remember it. Bagsby was very uneasy at its presence in camp.

Buck Barry brought up strongly the advisability of sending our treasure out to a safe place. His argument was given point by the arrival in camp one evening of three evil looking Mexicans, shabbily clothed, but well armed, and mounted on beautiful horses. We fed them well, but saw to the caps of our revolvers and the security of our corral before turning in for the night. In the morning they departed before we were stirring, without so much as a word of thanks. These mysterious visitors had given us no faintest inkling of their business or destination. Don Gaspar stated flatly that they had come to spy us out, having heard of our presence in the valley from the Indians.

"And I told them," said he triumphantly, "that soon we would be sen' out for the food."

He went on to argue that thus he had prepared their minds for the fact that pack horses would soon be going out. By distributing the gold its presence would be unsuspected.

I suggested a strong guard, but both Bagsby and Don Gaspar opposed me.

"There's enough of these yere robbers to git us anyhow, even if we all went," said Bagsby, "and that's why I want to send the stuff out now. The place they'll tackle will be right yere, if they tackle anything at all"—

I will not weary you with the pros and cons. At the time I thought, and I still think, the whole arrangement most ill advised; but against me was the united opinion of nearly the whole camp, including the most level headed members of my own party. It was finally agreed that Yank, Buck Barry and Don Gaspar should take out the gold.

They started very early in the morning, carrying the treasure in saddle bags and across the horns of the saddle. I argued that Yank rode much the lightest and had the strongest horse, and managed to get the others to confide to him a full half of the metal. At the last moment we had modified the original plan to suit everybody. The horsemen encumbered by pack animals were to push on as rapidly as possible in order to reach by nightfall the settlement where dwelt the Italian friend. Once there they could feel themselves reasonably safe. Johnny, Missouri Jones and I would ride with them until noon as a sort of escort for the uninhabited portion of the journey. By that hour we figured we should have reached the outskirts of the regular diggings, where, our experience told us, our companions would be safe.

Accordingly we pushed our mounts hard. Unhampered by pack animals, and aided by knowledge of the route, we made great progress. By noon we had passed the meadow of our night's camp. After a hasty lunch we accompanied our men a few miles farther, then said farewell and godspeed and hurried back in order to reach home before sunset.

CHAPTER XVIII.

The Robbery.

WE cooked ourselves a meal and built ourselves a fire. About midnight we heard the sounds of horses rapidly approaching. Immediately we leaped from our bunks and seized our rifles, peering anxiously into the darkness. A moment later, however, we were reassured by a shrill whistle peculiar to Buck Barry, and a moment later he and Don Gaspar rode into camp.

We assailed them with a storm of questions—why had they returned? What had happened? Where was Yank? Had there been an accident?

Don Gaspar, who appeared very weary and depressed, shook his head sadly. Barry looked at us savagely from beneath his brows.

"The gold is gone, and that's an end of it!" he growled.

At these words a careful, dead silence fell on us all. The situation had suddenly become too serious for hasty treatment. We felt instinctively that a wrong word might do irreparable damage. But in our hearts suspicion and anger and dull hatred leaped to life full grown. We tightened our belts, as it were, and clamped our elbows to our sides and became wary, watching with unfriendly eyes. Johnny alone opened his lips.

"Lost? I don't believe it!" he cried.

Barry cast an ugly look at him, but said nothing. We all saw that look.

"Where's Yank?" I asked.

"Dead by now, I suppose," flung back Barry.

"Good God!" I cried, and under my breath, "Then you've murdered him!"

I don't know whether Barry heard me or not, and at the time I did not much care. His sullen eye was resting on one after the other of us as we stood there in the firelight. Every face was angry and suspicious. Barry flung himself from his horse, tore the pad from its back, slapped it on the flank and turned away, reckless of where it went. He cut himself a steak and set to cooking his food, an uncompromising shoulder turned in our direction. Nor did he open his mouth to utter another word until the general discussion later in the evening. Don Gaspar, who owned the only riding saddle, unharnessed his horse, led it to water, knee haltered it and turned it loose to graze. While he was gone no one spoke, but we glanced at each other darkly. He turned, sat down by the fire, rolled himself a cigarette and volunteered his story.

"My frien'," said he, with a directness and succinctness utterly foreign to his everyday speech, "you want to know what happen'. Ver' well, it was like this."

He told us that after we had left them they hurried on as fast as possible in order to reach the settled country. Owing to the excellence of his animal he was generally some distance in advance. At one point, stopping on a slight elevation to allow them to catch up, he looked back in time to see two men on horseback emerge from the chaparral just behind his companions. Don Gaspar shouted and leaped from his saddle, but before the warning had reached the others a riata from the hand of one of the men had fallen with deadly accuracy around Yank's arms and body, jerking him violently from the saddle. The thrower whirled his horse to drag his victim. Don Gaspar fired and by great good luck shot the animal through the brain. It fell in a heap, pinning its rider beneath it. In the meantime Barry had leaped to the ground and from behind the shelter of his horse had shot the first robber through the body. Our two companions now drew together and took refuge behind some large rocks, preparing to receive the charge of a band of half dozen who now appeared. The situation looked desperate. Don Gaspar fired and missed. He was never anything of a marksman, and his first shot must have been a great piece of luck. Barry held his fire. The robbers each discharged his rifle, but harmlessly. Then just as they seemed about to charge in they whirled their horses and made off into the brush.

"We could not tell the why," observed Don Gaspar.

The two men did not speculate, but ran out to where Yank lay, apparently dead, his arms still bound close to his body by the noose of the riata. Barry cut the rope with his bowie knife, and they rolled him over. They found he still breathed, but that, beside the shock of his violent fall, he had been badly trampled by the horses. After a moment he came to consciousness, but when they attempted to lift him upright they found that his leg was broken.

At this moment they heard the sound of voices and, looking up, saw coming from the other direction a band of a dozen men, half of whom were on horseback and all of whom were armed. This looked serious.

"We got behind the rock," said Don Gaspar, "but we think to ourself our goose is cook."

The newcomers, however, proved to be miners who had heard the shots and who now came hurrying up. Evidently the robbers had caught sight or sound of their approach. They were much interested in the state of affairs, examined the horse Don Gaspar had killed, searched for and found the body of the robber Barry had shot. It proved to be a Mexican well known to them all and suspected to be a member of Andreas Aljo's celebrated band. They inquired for the dead horse's rider.

"And then, for the first time," said Don Gaspar, "we think of him. He went down with his horse. But now he was gone and also the horse of Senor Yank. But I think he crawl off in the chaparral and that the horse of Senor Yank run away with the other horse of the dead man."

We saw the futility of our first instinctive flare of suspicion. It was obvious that if Don Gaspar and Buck Barry had intended treachery they would never have returned to us. I think that, curiously enough, we were unreasonably a little sorry for this. It would have been satisfactory to have had something definite to antagonize. As it was, we sat humped around our fire until morning.

Yank Lay, Apparently Dead, His Arms Still Bound.

With daylight we began to get a grip on ourselves a little. I felt strongly that I should see to Yank and so announced. Johnny at once offered to accompany me. While we were talking over the future prospects McNally came over to us, saying:

"The boys are pretty well agreed that we ought to divide up what gold is left and let each man take care of his own share. Are you agreeable?"

We instantly assented. The scales were brought out, and the division began. It consumed most of the morning and was productive of much squabbling, in which, however, we took no part. Our share, including Yank's, with which we were intrusted, came to about thirty-one pounds, a value of about $7,000.

By noon we had packed our goods, and by night we had broken the back of our return journey.

We found a full grown town where we had left a few tents and miners' cabins. Its main street ran either side the deep dust of the immigrant trail and consisted of the usual shanties, canvas shacks and log structures, with rather more than the customary allowance of tin cans, old clothes, worn-out boots and empty barrels kicking around. The diggings were in the gulch below the road, but the streets of the town, and especially the shady sides of the buildings, were numerously furnished with lounging men.

Don Gaspar led the way for a short distance along the wagon road. On the outskirts of the settlement he turned aside to a small log cabin supplemented by a brush lean-to. A long string of bright red peppers hung down the face of it. To our knock came a very fat, rather dirty but exceedingly pleasant faced woman with glossy black hair, parted smoothly, and soft black eyes. She opened the door only the fraction of an inch at first, but instantly recognized Don Gaspar and threw it wide.

To our great relief, we found Yank very much alive. He greeted us rather feebly, but with satisfaction. We found that he had been kindly cared for and that the surface wounds and bruises from the horses' hoofs had been treated with some skill.

"But I reckon I'm hurt some inside," he whispered with difficulty, "for I can't breathe easy, and I can't eat nothin' but soup."

The broken leg too had been bound up after a fashion, but it was badly swollen above and below the bandages.

"He ought to have a doctor," said I positively. "There's no doubt of that. There must be some among the miners. There generally is. I'm going to see if I can find one."

I returned to town and hunted up the beefy, red faced hotel keeper, who had impressed me as being an honest man.

"Yes, there's a doctor," said he, "a mighty good one. He went by here a little while ago. Name's Dr. Rankin. I'll rustle him out for you. Oh, you Pete!" he shouted into the interior of the building.

A moment's shuffling about preceded the appearance of a negro boy of twelve or fourteen.

"Yes, sah."

"Go find Dr. Rankin and bring him here right away. Tell him a gentleman wants him."

Shortly the negro boy reappeared, closely followed by a man with a blue coat and white beaver hat, whom I had taken for an eccentric gambler. This man walked slowly up to face me.

"Well, sir?" he demanded. "I am told I can be of service. In what way?"

His piercing black eye held mine with a certain high arrogance.

"Professionally, doctor," I replied. "A friend of mine is lying badly hurt in a nearby hut."

For a barely appreciable instant his eye held mine after I had ceased speaking, as though he was appraising me. Then he bowed with old fashioned courtesy.

"At your service, sir," said he. "Pete, you black rascal, get my bag, and get it quick."

The little negro, who had stood by obviously worshiping, broke into a grin and darted into the hotel, almost instantly reappearing with a regulation professional satchel.

"At your service, sir," repeated Dr. Rankin.

Arrived at the hut of the Morenas, for that it seemed was the name of our host and hostess, Dr. Rankin laid aside his furry beaver hat, walked directly to the side of the bunk on which Yank lay and began his examination without vouchsafing anything or anybody else the slightest glance. At the end of ten minutes he threw the blanket over our friend's form and stood erect, carefully dusting the ends of his fingers against one another.

"Broken leg, badly set," said he; "two broken ribs, severe surface bruises and possibility of internal bruises in the region of the spleen. Neglected too long. Why wasn't I sent for before?"

We assisted at the rather dreadful process of resetting a broken leg three days old. At the end of the operation we were all pretty limp.

"How long?" gasped Yank, opening his eyes.

"Three months; not a day less if you want that leg to be as good as ever," stated Dr. Rankin uncompromisingly.

Yank closed his eyes and groaned.

The doctor resumed his coat and picked up his beaver hat.

"What treatment?" I ventured to ask.

"I will inform the woman," replied the doctor. "These Californians are the best nurses in the world, once things are on a proper footing."

"Your fee, sir?" asked Johnny very formally, for the doctor's brusque manner had rubbed.

"One ounce," stated Dr. Rankin. "I shall direct the woman, and I shall return one week from today unless conditions change. In that case summon me."

He pouched the gold dust that Johnny shook into the palm of his hand at a guess, bowed formally to each of us in turn, picked up his bag and departed rigidly erect, the fine red dust crawling and eddying at his feet.

Then we held a council of war, all of us. Don Gaspar announced his intention of returning to his rancho in the south.

"I have found the gold, and I have made fren's, and I have now enough," said he.

Bagsby, too, said he thought he would just ride down as far as Sutter's Fort, there to lay in a supply of powder and ball for a trip in the mountains.

"I kind of want to git up another b'ar fight," said he. "If I thought there was a ghost of a show to git them robbers fer you boys I'd stay and help you scout for them, but there ain't a show in the world. They've had a good three days' start."

After shaking hands with us again and again and obtaining promises that we should all surely meet in San Francisco or Monterey, they mounted and took their departure in order to get well clear of the settlement before nightfall.

When they had gone Yank opened his eyes from the apparent sleep into which he had fallen.

"You fellows don't hang around here with me. I can tell you that," he started. "I'm fixed all right. I want you to make arrangements with these people yere to keep me. Tuck my gold under my piller, stack old Betsey up yere in the corner by me and go about your business. You come out yere to dig gold, not to take keer of cripples."

"All right, Yank, we'll fix it somehaw," I agreed. "Now, if you're all right, Johnny and I will just go and straighten out our camp things a little."

CHAPTER XIX.

The Bully.

WE gravitated naturally to the diggings, which were very much like those at Hangman's Gulch, except that they were rather more extensive and branched out more into the tributary ravines. The men working there were, many of them, of a much better type than those we had seen in town, though even here was a large element of rough looking, wild, reckless customers. We wandered about here and there, our hands in our pockets, a vast leisure filling our souls. With some of the more pleasant appearing miners we conversed. They told us that the diggings were rich, good "ounce a day" diggings. We saw a good many cradles in use. It was easy to tell the old timers from the riffraff of newcomers. A great many of the latter seemed to lack the steadiness of purpose characteristic of nearly all the first rush. They worked haphazardly, spasmodically, pulling and hauling against each other. Some should not have been working at all, for their eyes were sunken in their heads from illness.

"We've got to hustle now," they told us. "We can take a good rest when the rains stop work."

We noticed especially a marked change in demeanor among some of the groups. In the early part of the summer every man answered every man good naturedly, except he happened to have a next day's head or some other sort of a personal grouch. Now many compact little groups of men worked quite apart. When addressed they merely scowled or looked sullen, evidently quite unwilling to fraternize with the chance comer.

We sauntered along peering into the various buildings. The saloons were here more elaborate than at Hangman's, the gambling places larger and with some slight attempt at San Francisco splendor—that is to say, there were large gilt framed mirrors on the walls, nude pictures and in some cases a stage for musical performers. One of the three stores was devoted entirely to clothing and "notions," to us a new departure in specialization. We were sadly in need of garments, so we entered and were at once met by a very oily, suave specimen of the chosen people. When we had escaped from this robber's den we looked at each other in humorous dismay.

"Glad Yank don't need clothes, anyway," said Johnny.

We were, it will be remembered, out of provisions, so we entered also one of the general stores to lay in a small supply. The proprietor proved to be an old friend, Jones, the storekeeper at Hangman's.

"Which," said Johnny shrewdly, "is a sad commentary on the decline of the diggings at Hangman's."

Jones was evidently prosperous and doing business on a much larger scale than at the old place, for in his commodious building were quantities of goods displayed and many barrels and boxes still unopened. He did not recognize us, of course, and we had to await the completion of a tale he was telling a group perched on the counters and on the boxes.

We turned into the entrance of the hotel, to find ourselves in the well remembered long, low room wherein we had spent the evening a few months before. It was now furnished with a bar, the flimsy partitions had been knocked out, and evidently additions had been constructed beyond the various closed doors.

The man behind the bar looked vaguely familiar to me, but I could not place him.

"Where's the proprietor of this place?" I asked him.

He indicated a short, blowsy, truculent looking individual who was at the moment staring out the window.

"There used to be an Italian"— I began.

The barkeeper uttered a short barking laugh as he turned to attend to a customer.

"He found the climate bad for his heart and sold out," said he.

On the wall opposite was posted a number of printed and written handbills. We stepped idly to examine them. They had in general to do with lost property, stolen horses and rewards for the apprehension of various individuals. One struck us in particular. It was issued by a citizens' committee of San Francisco and announced a general reward for the capture of any member of the "Hounds."

"Looks as if they'd got tired of that gang down there," Johnny observed. "They were ruling the roost when we left. Do you know, I saw one of those fellows this afternoon—perhaps you remember him—a man with a queer sort of blue scar over one cheekbone. I swear I saw him in San Francisco. There's our chance to make some money, Jim."

The proprietor of the hotel turned to look at Johnny curiously, and several of the loafers drinking at the bar glanced in the direction of his clear young voice. We went on reading and enjoying the notices, some of which were very quaint. Suddenly the door burst open to admit a big man followed closely by a motley rabble. The leader was a red faced, burly, whiskered individual, with a red beard and matted hair. As he turned I saw a star shaped blue scar above his cheekbone.

"Where's the blamed cur that is going to make some money out of arresting me?" he roared, swinging his huge form ostentatiously toward the center of the room.

I confessed I was aghast and completely at a loss. A row was evidently unavoidable, and the odds were against us. Almost at the instant the door

95 per cent for Exemption

The proclamation calling out the first class of men under the military Service act, is being quietly obeyed here, at least in so far as undergoing the medical examination is concerned. There is, however, a greater inclination among the eligibles to fight for exemption rather than for the Empire and it is a safe conjecture that 95 per cent of the draftees in this locality will put in exemption claims.– Mildmay Gazette.

Cost of Rural Highways

The report of W. A. McLean, Deputy Minister of Highways, shows that 28 million dollars have been spent on rural highways in Ontario during the last ten years and that 23 of the 39 counties in Ontario have adopted the county roads system. The cost per mile averages from $798.67 in Hastings County where stone and gravel is easily obtained to Haldimand County where the clay is like soft soap and stone and gravel have to be hauled long distances.

Society Teaches Navy Cooks To Cook.

Many prominent society women, led by Mrs. Adrian Iselin, have given up social activities in order to teach sailors to cook. Mrs. Iselin, writing in the November issue of Harper's Bazar, tells how, through her New York Cooking School, these women are training able seamen to prepare food properly and are rapidly lessening the shortage of capable chefs in the navy. Rear-Admiral Usher, U. S. N., has cooperated with Mrs. Iselin and has indorsed her work. The men have learned very quickly. In fact, Admiral Usher says: "Without this aid, it would have been a difficult matter for us to supply a sufficient number of competent cooks to the small vessels in the district, and to the large German liners which were recently taken over by the government."

"Fed Up" With Training

An officer of the 160th Batt'n writes:– "We are still keeping up our everlasting grind here. To-morrow at 4.30 a. m. we start on a three day's scheme which keeps us until Friday night and takes us to the other side of Aldershot. We get a little sleep in the day time and work all night. I don't know many of the particulars of the scheme but will tell you all about it later. It is supposed to be the hardest yet. If we don't know all there is to know about warfare of every kind it is our own fault as we have had practise in everything that the authorities know. We will be without doubt the best trained Division, Canadian or Imperial, which ever left England. All the experts admit that. We have been reviewed by General Hunter, General Turner, the Duke of Connaught, (twice) and by the King accompanied by Lord French. Why on earth they are keeping us poking around Surrey is a mystery to me. The men are absolutely fed up with it. Several battalions that spent the winter in Canada are over in the firing line now and lots of the officers I used to know are back in England and we are still here.

MARRIED

McPHAIL—TWEEDIE—At the Manse, Pinkerton, by Rev. R. M. Gale on Tuesday, Oct 16th, Harold Currie McPhail of Kincardine to Miss Elizabeth Tweedie of Kinloss Tp

Was In Smash-up.

Edgar S. Fischer, an old Bruce boy, who is firing on the G. T. R. out of Allandale, had a narrow escape recently in a head-on collision at Gowan. One of the trains overran its orders and they collided in a thick fog. Some of the crew were badly injured but Edgar fortunately escaped with a slight shaking up.

The Country Fair

Says the Globe:—The local agricultural society with its fall fair accompaniment, fills a place that the great exhibitions cannot fill. It performs a local service that no other existing organization can perform. The men who keep the organizations in vigorous life, often at great personal inconvenience, render a very real service to their own community and to the country as a whole.

Good Job For Hired Man

One of our advertisers reports that he recently received in reply to an advertisement for a hired man an application from a man who offered to come at once if the farmer would pay the freight on his goods, furnish free house, gas for fuel, vegetables, milk, cream and ice cream for the family and pay him $20 weekly, with every third afternoon off. This would-be farm laborer only wanted $1,040 per year with, counting 26 working days to the month, 104 half holidays, or 52 full holidays, or two months off. Besides this he desired two-thirds of his board, all of his fuel and insisted upon gas and a free house. Since when has farming become an occupation able to pay such wages? And our correspondent says he had several applications for the position, many of which were almost as bad. We would advise those with such high-flown ideas of their value on the farm not to call themselves mere hired men but to take on a more lofty appellation, such as Controller of Farm Finances, Commissioner of Farm Out-puts, or official Banker of Farm Returns. If not satisfied with these, perhaps one or two three-lettered words would suit—"nut" or "hog"—Farmer's Advocate.

Making A Compost Heap

The smell of dead leaves wet with autumn rains fills the mind of the ardent amateur gardener with visions of spring gardens, and a very successful one of these amateurs gives us a hint as to how to make the connection a very tangible one. "Start a compost heap," she says. "Dig a hole—say, two feet deep, and as big as necessary for the size of your garden. Save such garbage as cabbage leaves, tea leaves and coffee grounds. Get some manure, if possible and gather some fallen leaves. Place these layer by layer, with layers of earth between in the hole, and pile high above the level of the garden, for during the winter it will sink. This will help now with the garbage problem, and with cleaning the dead leaves from the streets, you have all the fertilizer you need for your garden."

LIVED HERE MANY YEARS

Death at Calgary of Mrs. John Latchford Formerly of Walkerton at a Ripe Old Age.

The death occurred at Calgary, on Monday evening, Oct 29th, of Margaret Perdue, relict of the late John Latchford of Carrick, at a very advanced age. Mrs. Latchford, who was well past the four score mark had been poorly for some time and her passing was not unexpected. Until a few months ago she was quite bright and active, enjoying a fair use of her faculties. It was then a great pleasure for her to knit for the soldiers and many a pair of socks were forwarded by her to the boys at the Front. Mrs. Latchford was born in Ireland, crossing the ocean with her parents at the age of 4. For many years they resided north of Toronto, but the greater portion of her life was spent in Carrick and after her husband's death 32 years ago, in Walkerton. The past few years she made her home with her youngest daughter, Mrs. Runnalls at Calgary. Mrs. Latch ord was a woman of sterling character nd a lifelong member of the Presbyter- an Church. She was well known and ghly thought of here, especially by e older people. Four sons and two ughters survive:—Frank, of the T. R., Walkerton, William of Minne- ota, Wesley and Jos. of Brandon, Mrs. uis Race of Brandon, and Mrs. Run- lls of Calgary. The remains are ng brought East for burial in Walk- n Cemetery. The funeral arrange- s have not yet been completed, as ot yet known when the remains arrive here.

"Sandy" In The Field.

Coun. Sandy McCarter is the first member of the Town Council to announce that he is in the field for 1918 Coun. McCarter has proved a faithful and conscientious councillor. He thrives on abuse although he doesn't seem to get fat on it. With his two years experience at the Board Sandy should be able to serve the public better than ever.

Kain—Marquis.

Mel. Kain, a well-known Walkerton boy was married at Bothwell, Ont. on Wednesday morning, to Miss Nellie Marquis of that place. Melville enlisted in the 64th Battery, Guelph. Two weeks ago he was rejected and he then took a position in London. The happy couple arrived here by the night G. T. R. train Wednesday to spend a few days at the groom's old home.

Clancy—Frank

The marriage took place at St. Boniface church, New Germany, Ont. on Tuesday, October 20th, of Miss Marion E. Frank, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Frank, to James T. Clancy, G. T. R. Agent at Walkerton, younger son of Mr. and Mrs. John Clancy of Cargill. On their return from their honeymoon Mr and Mrs Clancy will live in Major Henderson's double residence on Yonge St.

Milk Advances Today

Milk goes up to 9 cents a quart today in Walkerton. Mr. Wilfrid Dippell, who has bought Reeve Russel's dairy business, takes it over today and simultaneously the price of lacteal fluid soars 1 cent. Mr. Dippel told the Telescope over the phone yesterday that the farmers were putting up the price on him the first of the month and the margin of profit is small. Some surrounding towns are already paying 10 cents, be stated, mentioning Teeswater. By adding the Russell route to his own, Mr. Dippell practically gets control of the milk business in Walkerton.

Chesley Takes Keystone Trophy

It looked last week as if the Keystone Bowling Trophy would spend the winter in Walkerton but on Friday along came a rink from Chesley skipped by Thos. Ross of Chesley and carried off the silver-ware. Thos. Pye was the defender of the Trophy and the two Tommies put up a vigorous battle in the rain. At first the visitors outbowled Walkerton and got a big lead. It was the last shot in the last end that did the deed. Walkerton was up on the score board and lying three, when a Chesley bowl wandered through and after caroming a few times came in for shot. The score was 16—14. The local rink was C. H. Rogers, H. G. Hunter, Jas. T. Clancy and T. Pye, skip. The trophy will now probably repose in winter quarters at Chesley.

Should Apply In Writing.

A letter received yesterday by Mr. Frank Rennie, from the District Registrar's Office at London contains some important information. The letter states that men applying for exemption will be instructed by the registrar's office to put their case in support of their application in writing and send it to the tribunals. In this way a great number of applications will be cleared up by correspondence. The men will have to appear before the Tribunal only in case they are summoned to appear personally for further information. Men in Walkerton district will likely have their cases decided by the Walkerton tribunal but not necessarily. It is the policy of the Central office to instruct men to report at the nearest tribunal but the hearings before Tribunals will be equalized in number to some extent.

Big Liquor Fines

Magistrates Tolton and Richardson imposed heavy fines on Duncan Curry of Bruce and Robert Osborne, two farmers who got in big shipments of whiskey and then couldn't satisfactorily explain what they did with the booze. Cases, bottles and all, had vanished when Inspector White appeared on the scene a few days after the shipments had been received. Curry said he had broken up the case and thrown it down an old well on his farm Osborne also testified that he had thrown his case down an old well. Alex Russell, another farmer up on a liquor charge, also had recourse to a well. Greenock must be honeycombed with old wells. The well stories did not go down with the magistrates. Curry and Osborne were fined $200 and costs each. Nothing was proved against Russell and he was allowed to go free.

DON'T MISS THE POINT!

There is a man in this part of the world who represents, to our way of thinking, a pretty good average of human nature. Whenever the preacher in his church delivers a very hot sermon against some special kind of sin, this man gets enthusiastic and goes around to the vestry to tell the preacher what a fine sermon it was Then he goes home and repeats it to his brother, and they talk over the points and the people the sermon hit the hardest. But this particular man never sees when the sermon hits HIM

In a few days the biggest public campaign ever put on in Canada will be opened to get subscriptions for the fourth Canadian war loan, the Victory Loan. The thing people in this district must bear in mind: that the appeals are directed to each and every one of them. It is not merely the well-off men and women who are being asked to invest. It is everybody The little sermons which will be "preached" in the advertising should not be taken as hints to the well to-do people only. Every man and women should watch for these advertisements and start now to gather up the necessary money to buy either a fifty or a hundred or a five hundred or a thousand dollar bond. In the United States there were about 4 subscribers to the first American loan out of every 100 persons. They only received 3½%. In Canada for the last war loan there were only about 41,000 subscribers or say 4 in every 700. Yet in Canada the interest was much higher—on the Victory Bonds that will probably be issued to yield about 5½%.

The first thing anyone should do, in our opinion, is to get rid of the idea that there is any sacrifice involved in investing in this loan. It is true that the patriotic spirit is appealed to and it is equally true that a great and generous response is expected on that ground. But the new war loan is a straightaway business proposition: safe profitable and convenient. Every man and every women with as much as fifty dollars to spare should own one of these new war bonds, and not only that, but should help to show others the worth of these bonds by recommending them everywhere. The readers of this paper are among the most thrifty, prosperous and public spirited in the Dominion. When the subscriptions to the Victory Loan are added up from the different districts and subdistricts we expect them to show that this part of the great Dominion has been true to its traditions and just to its opportunities.

Hobnobbing With Sphinx

Wilfrid Cryderman, who is now a surgeon in His Majesty's Navy in the Mediterranean tells of visits which he paid to Alexandria and Cairo while on leave recently. He visited the famous pyramids and got quite a view of Egyptian life. At the Island of Malta he had the experience of bathing within two hundred yards of the spot where the Apostle Paul was shipwrecked. His sister, Nursing Sister Ethel Cryderman has been transferred to a hospital at Shorncliffe and expects to go to France very soon.

Hydro By-law At New Years.

Mayor Johnston has had word from the District Hydro Electric Engineer that Hydro is ready to go ahead with their proposition to supply Walkerton with hydro power. The scheme is to take over the two plants of the Saugeen Electric Co. at Walkerton and to develope further power on the Saugeen, to reinforce the Eugenia System. Kincardine, Wingham and other outlaying towns will likely be included in the scheme. The letter states that figures will be along in good time so that the ratepayers of Walkerton will have an opportunity of voting on the Hydro Money By law at the municipal elections in January.

Appointment Switched

The pointed criticism offered by Mr. Frank Rennie at a public gathering at Cargill two weeks ago has brought forth fruit. Mr. Rennie, who was the first member of the local tribunal to be appointed, said from the Cargill platform there should have been a Catholic and a returned soldier out of the three appointments. Mr. Rennie's speech made the Torry busses sit up. The sequel is that a few days later a few influential Conservatives assembled at Cargill to see what could be done. After the meeting it was learned that Mr. W. J. McNally had tendered his resignation as military representative at the Walkerton tribunal, his place being taken by Mr. John Clancy of Cargill. Mr. Clancy is a Roman Catholic, a liberal, is well-known throughout the County and is considered a man of more than ordinary good judgment.

OUR HIGH SCHOOL

An Institution That has Been a Credit and a Valuable Asset to the Town of Walkerton.

It is to the everlasting credit of the early residents of Walkerton that they were among the first in this part of the province to recognize that man cannot live by the "three R's" alone and that the best possible training along intellectual lines is none too good for the younger generation who would make the most of their opportunities. It was back in '72, the year following the incorporation of the town, that the High School was established. For lack of a proper building the school had a migratory history for some years. It was not until 1879 that the present fine structure was completed and the school at last moved into a proper building of its own. Walkerton High School is unique in having had almost throughout its entire history only one principal. In 1881 Mr. Jos Morgan M. A., a then recent graduate of the University of Toronto, came to take the headmastership and from that time until this he has presided over the destinies of our institute of higher learning. So much depends for real success upon the personality of the teacher, that it is fortunate those old trustees chose for the principalship a man of high ideals, who has always emphasized the value of character. It was "higher education" in a very real sense in those days for all the teaching was done in the upper storey of the school, the first floor being vacant. Soon after Mr. Morgan's arrival, this was changed and the school arranged very much as at the present time. In the eighties there was only one other school, Kincardine, in this part of the country, and pupils came from Port Elgin, Southampton, Wiarton, Durham and all parts of Bruce County and beyond, the attendance running well up to two hundred pupils. The Board at that time was composed of: Alex Shaw M. P., chairman, M. McNamara, sec-treas., W. Collins, J. G. Cooper, county treas., John Bruce, Thos. Dixon. Of these Mr. Thos. Dixon is still a member of the Board, and probably holds the destinction of having held the position of High School trustee longer than any other trustee in Ontario. Of the others, Mr. Shaw and Mr. McNamara, long since deceased, are to-day represented on the Board by their sons. Few schools in the Province have had as worthy a record. Year after year matriculation scholarship pupils have gone forth to further triumphs in the Halls of Learning at Toronto. Two or three illustrious graduates might be named, and there are scores of others who may have achieved equal success but are less in the public view. Rev. John McNeill, one of Canada's greatest preachers, is a Paisley boy, who studied the classics under the guiding hand of Mr. Morgan. Hon. Duncan Marshall, Minister of Agriculture of Alberta, made his first attempts at oratory in the Debating Society. Mr. Robert Tegler of Edmonton, who is visiting his old home here this week, is a graduate who has been much in the public eye as the builder of the Tegler block, Edmonton, one of the largest office buildings in the British Empire.

The school has been favored with good teachers, a number of whom have gone out to responsible positions in the educational field. Mr. H. Conn, a former teacher, is now School Inspector for Lambton. J. J. Witton was afterwards Principal of the Technical school, Hamilton. John Elliot is now principal of Mitchell High School. J. C. Norris is a member of the staff of North Bay Normal School.

While the school's constituency has been narrowed by the opening of other high schools, Walkerton H. S. is as well equipped for staff, plant, and promising pupils, as in its palmiest days. All the work prescribed for High Schools up to the University Exams is taught and Walkerton High School still takes a good standing in the annual Departmental exams.

The staff consists of the following teachers:—Joseph Morgan M. A., Classics and English; Miss M. E. McGregor B. A., Modern History and Art; Miss Cummer, Science and Commercial; Mr. A. D. Lamont B. A., Mathematics The High School Board are:—H. M. Lay, Chairman; Thos. Dixon, W. M. Shaw, O. E. Klein, Geo. D. McKay, Dr. Stalker, Dr. Halladay, I. H. McNamara.

VOLUME XLIX NUMBER 43
WALKERTON, NOVEMBER 1st, '17

EDITORIAL COMMENT

THE Town Council is to be commended for bringing in a by-law to regulate the street traffic. The rapidity increasing number of autoes, makes it more than ever necessary that rules be laid down governing the roads in order that accidents may be avoided. The by-law drafted by Town Clerk Collins embodies the best points of a number of Traffic by-laws in forge in different towns and cities. There is one clause however that should be amended before the by-law is put through and that is the clause stating that vehicles are permitted to stand not more than twenty minutes. Walkerton's chief occupation from a business standpoint is selling goods to the farmers. Everything that can possibly be done to make this town attractive to shoppers from the country should be done. The clause prohibiting rigs from standing on Main St. is not going to remedy any present abuse and would be an inconvenience to the farmers. There is no present need for such a clause and it would only serve to irritate our good friends from the country.

BREAKFAST FOODS, says the Food Controller, must henceforward not be sold in packages of less than twenty pounds weight. They can, however, be bought in bulk in any quantity desired. Few will see any great gain in this fiat for the consumer. Package goods, while costing slightly more than goods purchased in bulk, make for cleanliness, quality and convenience. Infinitely more important steps could be taken for the relief of consumers, and probably Mr. Hanna is now beginning to think so too; for both wholesalers and retailers have been given an extension of time of one month for the disposal of goods in smaller packages than twenty pounds—the wholesalers to December 1st and the retailers to January 1st.

STORIES to the effect that whole battalions of Canadian troops were tied up in England owing to venereal disease, have proven to be without foundation. It is true that these diseases exist to an alarming extent both in this country and in England, but the dangers are greater in private life than in military camp. According to the statements made by the military authorities, the men are examined regularly. Precautions are urged upon them and punishments follow. They are isolated when they have the disease. Leaders of thought are taking an active interest in the stamping out of this evil which constitutes a grave menace to the country. More education from childhood up will be required to accomplish it.

ACCOUNTANTS' figures submitted before the bacon investigation at Toronto showed that the profits of the William Davies Company were $169,762 in 1914, $68,317 in 1915, $1,639,000 in 1916, and $1,000,000 up to the end of August, 1917. Sir Joseph Flavelle, who is the largest shareholder in the Company, said he had "no qualms of conscience" about accepting such profits. As The Toronto Telegram (Tory) says: The evidence of Sir Joseph Flavelle is appalling in its revelation of Sir Joseph's inability to realize that the ordinary standards of commercial prudence and business integrity are superseded by other and higher standards in wartime."

KINCARDINE has given $3,000 to the Red Cross, Port Elgin $2700, Lucknow $2500. In Walkerton the Council has not yet made a grant but the citizens have contributed $1600 We hope the Council will profit by the example of other towns and give the Walkerton figures a good boost.

MR CHARLES BAECHLER of Black Horse, who has announced himself as a non-partisan candidate for South Bruce favors cutting the M. P.'s indemnities in half. Judging from some of the members who are drawing $2,500 a year, we are afraid to think what a $1250 M. P. would look like.

STILL IN ENGLAND

But Hopes To Get Back To France And do a Little Bit More—Sends Regards To Walkerton Friends

Mr. R. E. Truax M. P. had the following interesting letter this week from Sergt. George Kingsbury:—

Canadian M. G. Depot,
Seaford, Sussex,
October 7th., 1917.

Dear Mr. Truax:—

I have received your letter of August 31st, and was indeed glad to hear from you. At the time of writing am glad to say, that all is well, enjoying the very best of health, and feeling fine, hardly anything is to be seen of my wound now. Yes, I said that I expected to go to the Front, well so I shall, but not yet awhile. The Colonel here in this Depot, has given me a nice quiet job, being my own boss, practically, I am working down at the Freight yard next to Seaford Station, superintending all the material, that is required for the machine gun depot. It suits me fine for awhile. It is a good rest for me, but when I get taken off the job, I think the only thing for me to do, is to get back with the boys in France, and do a little bit more. There is one thing, why I do not like soldiering in England, there is so much red tape. I too would have been delighted to have paid you a visit for a few weeks, but it's not to be, but I firmly believe, that before another year has passed and all goes well with me, I shall be back with you once more. When convalescent at Hastings, did think about writing to you to see if you could do anything to get me over on furlough, but then I thought you had quite enough to do, and plenty of worry, so did not bother you. I must thank you indeed for offering to intercede for me had you known. Well by this time, guess you are through at Ottawa, and back home again. Suppose you are not at all sorry, it certainly has been a long session. Glad to know that things are fairly busy at the factory, hope it will continue so. Please remember me to Harry, hope he is quite well, and doing alright, should be pleased to hear from him. I am sure we must all feel grateful, that the crops are so good but as you say, it is the gathering in of them. Hope the difficulty will be overcome. It is just the same in England, as regards to prices. Wages have gone up enormously, but everything is so dear. Again do I thank you, for seeing into the matter, of my mother's separation allowance. It is indeed so kind of you, and thanks for the letter you forwarded on. Yes when the election takes place, you can depend on my support, and will do my very utmost to get others to follow me, I wish you luck. Well time is passing very quickly, only ten week's now to Xmas, and come to think of it on the 30th. of this month, it will be three years since I signed up, at the Walkerton armouries. It hardly seems true to me. So the War still goes on and on. The past two weeks have shown what we can do on the Western Front. There is no doubt at all, what the issue will be, although the goal is in sight, the road is still a long one, but we are going over it, the boys out there are pushing the Hun, back and back, and before long the German Nation, will have learnt its lesson. Well I will now close for this time. Shall be expecting a letter from you again soon. Please remember me to all the boys in the factory, often picture myself there running the sanding machine, and hoping that you are quite well, also Mrs. Truax, and your daughter, Elizabeth, please remember me to them. Goodbye for the present.

Yours Truly,
George Kingsbury.

LAURIER AND BOURASSA

(Toronto Saturday Night)

That pestiferous person, Mr. Henri Bourassa, has added to the gayety of nations by calling that honourable gentleman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the "most nefarious man in Quebec" and declaring the latter is "shielding himself behind his white hair." Mr. Bourassa is so silly that it is hard to realize he is dangerous. Mr. Bourassa is a thorough cad in his recent abuse of England, inasmuch as he is a British subject, reviling the very power which protects the precious gentleman's property. In fact the latest utterances of Bourassa the Abominable make us wonder at the patience and long-suffering of the Canadian Government, which tolerates this mischievous mountebank. Would any but a British people allow such vicious stuff to be promulgated as that which Mr. Bourassa talked at Nicolet? The charge of England's "tyranny" in Canada is rather absurd, from a man whose treasonable talk would not be tolerated in any other nation. He and the pretty, but unlovely "Colonel" Lavergne are doing their best (or worst) to stir up civil strife in Canada, but would bear no part in such a conflict, were it once accomplished. The Bourassa enmity is the highest compliment which has been paid Sir Wilfrid, who is too honorable and true to forget the Empire and Dominion which be has served so faithfully.

NOT A SINGLE FIRE

Reported In Ontario Where The Barns Were Rodded—Provincial Fire Marshall Makes Emphatic Statement

"It is nothing short of CRIMINAL that so many barns should be destroyed by fire when there is a simple and efficacious remedy on hand". This is pretty strong language but it is the official opinion of the Provincial Fire Marshall, taken from the Public Service Bulletin for September. It refers to the lightning-rodding of buildings and his very emphatic statement is justified by hard facts. According to the Fire Marshall, (Public Service Bulletin for August, page 25) he had reports on 126 barns struck by lightning in June. He found that in only one case out of the whole 126 was there any pretension to a lightning rod equipment. In this particular case the rod had been installed eight years previously and it was well-known to the farmer that the wires entering the ground had been corroded and were broken. In these circumstances the equipment was of course, altogether worthless. The Fire Marshall gives an instance of one of the very best barns in the Eastern part of the province valued at $16,000 being destroyed by lightning, together with its contents. It was up-to-date in all particulars except that it was not equipped with lightning rods. The Fire Marshall's statements coincide exactly with the experience of Robt Trench of Teeswater the "Lightning Rod King". Mr. Trench has been in the business 20 years and during all that time, not one dollar's damage has been done by lightning to any building which he rodded. The time has come when insurance companys that are alive to the interests of themselves and their patrons, will discriminate in rates in favor of well rodded buildings. Farmers are coming to realize that it is simply suicidal to leave their buildings unrodded as the big list of installations booked by Mr. Trench's popular local agent, James Gowanlock, clearly shows. Mr. Gowanlock who has had a phenomenal year's business, feels that he is doing every farmer a good turn when he signs him up for a service which, experience has shown, affords absolute protection from lightning at a comparatively small cost.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson V.—Fourth Quarter, For Nov. 4, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, I Kings xx, 1-21. Memory Verses, 10, 11—Golden Text, I Kings xx, 11—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

The story of Elijah in the preceding chapters as he stood so nobly and grandly for God is most inspiring, and God's loving care of him at Cherith and Zarephath, and when discouraged and weary he lay and slept under the juniper tree and wanted to die, but an angel fed him twice and sent him on his way, is all so comforting, for the same God is our God and Father if we are in Christ, and He is always full of compassion. If we only knew Him as we might, how happy we would be, and how He would glorify Himself in us! We must not see people nor be afraid of them, for the Spirit is saying to us, "Who art thou that thou shouldest be afraid of a man * * * and forgettest the Lord, thy maker?" (Isa. li, 12, 13.)

Our lesson today is the story of thirty three drunken kings with such an host of soldiers and horses and chariots that they seemed to fill the country, while the children of Israel seemed like two little flocks of kids (verses 1, 12, 16, 27). The king of Syria, with whom the thirty-two kings were associated, sent word to Ahab, king of Israel, that all his wealth and even his wives and children belonged to him, the king of Syria. How suggestive of the devil, who dared to tell the Lord Jesus that all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them belonged to him (Matt. iv, 8, 9; Luke iv, 5, 6). Ahab seemed at first to consent to this (verses 2-4), but when the king of Syria sent again demanding the right to search the houses and help himself to all that he desired then the king of Israel and his elders stood against it (verses 5-9).

How suggestive the unrighteous and cruel demands of the drunken king and his associates are of the way strong drink treats a man who becomes its slave by ruining his home and taking from him his wife and children and all his pleasant things! Now, Ahab was certainly one of the worst of men, as it is written in chapter xxi, 25. "There was none like unto Ahab, who did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord, whom Jezebel, his wife, stirred up," but Israel was the Lord's people, though in rebellion against Him, and for the honor of His name He sent a prophet to Ahab, saying, "I will deliver this great multitude into thine hand this day, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord" (verse 13). So the king of Israel and his men slew the Syrians with a great slaughter (verse 21).

Then the Syrians said, "Their gods are the gods of the hills, so we will fight against them in the plain and shall surely conquer them." Therefore a man of God came again to Ahab with this message, "Because the Syrians have said the Lord is God of the hills, but He is not God of the valleys, therefore will I deliver all this great multitude into thine hand, and ye shall know that I am the Lord" (verse 28). Again the little flocks of kids had the victory over the great host of their enemies and slew 100,000 in one day, and a wall fell upon 27,000. It makes us think of the day when more died by the hailstones which the Lord cast down from heaven than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword (Josh. x, 11), and also of the 185,000 whom an angel slew in one night (II Kings xix, 35).

How many ways the Lord has to accomplish His purposes, and at the close of nearly two years of this madness of the nations (June, 1916) we cannot but wonder what would happen if Israel's God should come and cease to keep silence (Ps. l, 3). These two great deliverances were intended to lead Ahab to know the Lord (verses 13, 28), and yet in the end of our lesson chapter we find him making a covenant of peace with this same king of Syria (verse 34), and in the next chapter we see him committing murder for the sake of a little bit of another's property. The worst of sinners and of drunkards may be saved, have been saved, but there must be an honest turning to the Lord with the whole heart.

In chapter xxi, 27-29, we see Ahab humbling himself before the Lord and being spared a little longer, but in chapter xxii, 27, we see him putting a servant of the Lord in prison and feeding him with bread and water because he spoke the truth. Oh, how wonderful is the patience and long suffering of the Lord with all sinners, not willing that any should perish, but how desperately wicked is the heart of sinful man and how cruel the destroyer, the murderer, the liar and father of lies! The God of peace will bruise Satan under our feet shortly, and He is able to deliver from his power even now if any one is really willing to be delivered (Rom. xvi, 20; Heb. vii, 25). Let us never forget that pride and rebellion against God and turning away from His word and going our own way are called by God drunkenness and staggering (Isa. xxix, 9-13; li, 21). The remedy for each and all is the sacrifice of Christ brought home to the heart in the power of the Holy Spirit. There must be a sincere turning to God with the whole heart—no mere word of mouth, but an honest transaction between the soul and God, for He looketh upon the heart.

Miss Vera Norrish of Niagara Falls, was bridesmaid, in peacock blue broadcloth, black fox furs, black hat, and boquet of red roses. Mr. Nelson L. Standish was best man. The bride and groom left immediately after the ceremony for the station, and went away on the 5 o'clock train for New York. On their return they will reside at 31 Melbourne avenue, Toronto

Russia Faces Disaster That May Prove Set-Back To Democratic Progress

A GREAT tragedy is being enacted in the life of the free Russian people, according to Arthur Henderson, member of the British War Council, and representative of Labor, who has just returned to London from an extended visit to Russia. He is convinced that unless the situation is handled with firmness there must be an inevitable disaster.

Mr. Henderson said during the course of an interview that it was nothing less than misfortune that the continuance of the coalition Government proved impossible. The difficulties the Government had to cope with were such as no other Government ever experienced. It was impossible to convey anything like an adequate conception of the extent to which the extremists dominated the life of the capital, demoralising the army and navy, especially those units in close proximity to Petrograd.

The true extremists, he declared, did not represent more than a small minority of the population, but such had been the spirit of terror exercised, together with their destructive influence over certain sections of the military forces, that they had succeeded in rendering a stable Government difficult, if not almost impossible.

ARTHUR HENDERSON

Mr. Henderson considered that the most disastrous experiment of the revolution was the relaxation of discipline in the army and navy, coupled with the direct association of those services with the political and revolutionary propaganda. The resumption of the offensive caused the extremists considerable annoyance, and, although they had the wisdom to remain quiet while victories were being gained, it was generally recognized that they were waiting for an opportunity for the move recently made with such disastrous consequences.

"If Russia is to rise to the greatness of her possibilities, the forces of disorder must be resolutely dealt with," continued Mr. Henderson. "The future, judging from the recent past, is largely in the hands of the new Workmens' and Soldiers' Council elected by the all-Russia Congress, which represents a large section of the community whose representatives are likely to become the dominant party in the constituent assembly."

The Russians, said Mr. Henderson, were exceedingly anxious concerning the conference of the Allies, including the United States, because they hoped it would enable them to announce that the war treaties had been revised in the direction of renunciation of all intentions inconsistent with their own declarations. They said frankly that they were determined—keeping Constantinople in mind and having doubts regarding Mesopotamia—not to leave the settlement of the paramount issues of the war to chance decisions of a meeting of diplomats. Until this position was clarified, he doubted whether the whole army or a majority of the moderate Socialists, upon whom so much depended, would give of their best for the successful prosecution of the war.

The Russian Socialists, he said, were strong advocates of an international conference. He discussed the subject with M. Tschetelli, Minister of Posts and Telegraphs, just before leaving Petrograd. M. Tseretelli urged the importance of such a conference and of Great Britain being represented.

Korea Uses a Spoon.

While China and Japan take rice with chopsticks, Korea eats hers with a spoon. Prediction is that the next step will usher in the broad fork. "Whence comes this peculiarity?" asks the Korea Magazine. "One reason is that in the Analects of Confucius a record exists that the Master ate his millet, not with chopsticks, but with a spoon. Every saying that pertains to Confucius is reverently regarded in Korea, and the people of that land would rather follow the Master than present-day custom."

CONSERVING OUR FOOD

NEW FOOD CONTROLLER MAKES MANY PLANS.

Under the Organization Outlined by Hon. W. J. Hanna Every Department of Life Where Food Can Be Saved Will Be Looked After With Great Care.

THE collective food experience of the Dominion is to be employed to solve the food problem and secure essential food supplies for Great Britain and the Allied armies and nations. There is to be the closest possible co-operation between the food controller's office, the Federal and Provincial Governments, and national and local organizations of a public character.

The basis of organization of the food controller's office provides for the creation of six departments to deal with various phases of the food problem.

There will be a central advisory committee composed of representatives of the Government, the churches, labor organizations, educational departments and institutions, urban interests, farmers, rural municipalities, and men's and women's organizations. This central body will advise the departments through the food controller.

Provincial machinery is to be established through the creation of special provincial committees to advise upon plans prepared by the departments and approved by the food controller. Each provincial committee will include in its personnel representatives of the Government, of the churches, of the schools, of the farmers, of labor, of urban and rural districts, and of men's and women's associations. In addition, special committees, representing producers, manufacturers, handlers, and consumers of food products, will be appointed to investigate and formulate plans for action on individual problems dealt with by the departments. Action has already been taken in this regard by the creation of the food consumption control committee and the fish committee.

The interior organizations of the food controller's office will include:

Food saving department.
Food industries department.
Food distribution department.
Information and statistics department.
Business and office department.
Educational department.

The food saving department will deal with such problems as—

(a) Consumption in public eating places, etc.

(b) Instruction in methods of conservation in private houses.

(c) Instruction in preservation of perishable products.

(d) Instruction in substitution of foods to take the place of those required for export.

(e) Securing the co-operation of national, provincial, and local organizations.

The food industries department will have charge of—

(a) Matters relating to flour, bread, meat, fish, dairy products, canned and all manufactured food.

(b) Preparation of certain foods in order to encourage their use and to insure plentiful supplies.

The food distribution department will be divided into sections—

(a) To deal with purchase, prices, storage, transport, and sale of food for home consumption and export problems.

(b) To advise with British and foreign buyers.

(c) To advise with handlers and shippers.

The information and statistics department will have sub-divisions to—

(a) Gather statistics from Government departments and international sources, and tabulate them for the use of the other departments.

(b) Ascertain the quantity, location, ownership, and sources of food supplies for home consumption and for export.

The business department, in charge of the assistant chief of staff, will handle general office organization, accounting, finances, office supplies, and systematic filing of all data and correspondence.

The Educational Department will be responsible for the dissemination of general news for the information and instruction of the public, and the publication of all educational and other matters supplied to it by other departments.

The personnel of the national and provincial advisory committees, and the heads of the various departments will be announced shortly.

A New Departure.

Private property was commandeered for military purposes for the first time in the short history of the Dominion when the Military Hospitals Commission took over the Brant House on Burlington Beach and the cottages connected with it a few days ago to be used for hospital purposes. A convalescent home was needed, and the authorities could not secure it at short notice. Several efforts to arrange for the taking over of suitable premises had fallen through, so the Brant House was picked, and the owner received a paper to the effect that "His Majesty the King demands the property." Of course compensation will be paid to the proprietor, and in the meantime a choice convalescent home has been secured for the men.

Nothing Lost.

Officer—Hang it! you've brought the wrong boots. Can't you see one is black and the other brown?

Irish Batman—Sure, sor, but the other pair is just the same.

Or Those Fit to Be.

Professor—Does the moon affect the tide?

Co-ed—No, sir; merely the untied.

CANADA

Will Class One Provide The One Hundred Thousand Men?

It will be greatly to the advantage of Canada if the entire quota of 100,000 men to be raised under the Military Service Act can be secured from the first class; that is, from the men between the ages of 20 and 34 who were unmarried or widowers without children on July 6th, 1917.

This is almost self-evident for the following reasons:

It is admitted that, between the ages of 20 and 34, the average man is at the height of his physical strength and is most adaptable to the change of conditions from civilian life;

the military service of unmarried men and widowers without children would occasion less distress than that of most others, since they are largely without dependents. Also, it would entail less financial burden for Canada, through separation allowances, etc.

Authorities estimate that, after all proper exemptions have been allowed, Canada should be able to produce from the first class 100,000 men fit for service, so the drain upon the man power of the country will not be severe.

Members of Class One will be well advised to present themselves for examination immediately to the Medical Board in their district. Upon examination as to their physical fitness, they will be placed in one of the following categories:

Category A—d fit for service in overseas fighting units.
Category B—d fit for service overseas in Army Medical Corps, Forestry Battalion, etc.
Category C—d fit for service in Canada only.
Category E—d unfit for military service of any nature.

If not placed in Category A, the applicant will know that he is not liable for immediate service, but will go to the Post Office and send in a claim for exemption with his Medical Certificate attached, when he will receive in due course a certificate of exemption until those in his medical category are summoned for service.

Where a man, who is placed in category A, feels that exemption should be allowed, an application form can be secured from the postmaster. This form, when filled in, will be forwarded by the postmaster to the registrar of the district, and the applicant will be informed by mail as to the time and place for the consideration of his application by the Exemption Board.

Issued by The Military Service Council.

Revisit Old Town

Two well-known former Walkertonians, Messrs John and T. V. Kennedy, spent yesterday in town calling on old friends. The two brothers met at Detroit on Tuesday and decided to run up and spend a day looking over the scene of former days. Mr. John Kennedy, who at one time conducted a woollen mill here, is now a prosperous rancher and horseman living just outside of Medicine Hat. It is now 28 years since he left Walkerton. Mr. Kennedy said he found the town little changed, although more substantial in appearance than when he left Bruce. His brother, is a retired druggist, living in Philadelphia.

Grandfather Of Longboat

In illustrating a point in his sermon on Sunday morning Rev. C. W. Cosens told of a Brantford Indian making 80 miles in one day during the rebellion of '37, when he carried a message from Niagara to London for the military authorities. Tolego, the Indian, made a bee-line through the bush covering this great distance between sunrise and sunset. All he ate was a few pieces of dried venison which he chewed as he ran. The next day he was none the worse for wear and walked 20 miles further to his home at Munrey. It is not surprising to learn that this wonderful redskin was the grandfather of Tom Longboat, the famous Canadian runner, who still beats the best of them at the Military Field Meets over in France.

Took Course In Old London

Batt'n Sergt. Major Harry K. Watts of the 160th Batt'n, has been taking a special course in Old London and writes home enthusiastically about the work. Officers and R. S. M's from all parts of the British Isles are there, and are drilled by Sergts. and Sergt.-Majors of the Grenadiers and Scots and Welsh Guards. Harry was the only Canadian taking the course. At the recent examinations he took a full 100 per cent which was certainly encouraging. Harry writes his sister, Mrs. David Disch:—"I sure have seen something of London in two weeks. The barracks is right in the centre of the city. A penny ride on the bus or tube to the Strand or Picadilly or Leicester Square. Have seen some grand shows. I have been all around the principal parts of London. Everything is all aglow here. Would take a month to tell you all. It would open the eyes of Walkerton people to be here. The first night I came here I was in the Strand when the air raid was on. It was awful. You may have read about it, but it is getting common in London."

Why Canada Needs More Money

Up to date the war has cost Canada about $700,000,000.
Canada has spent in Canada over $400,000,000 on her own account.
Canada has spent in Canada on behalf of Great Britain over $300,000,000.
What Canada spends for Great Britain is really loaned to Great Britain and will be repaid or credited to Canada later on.

Great Britain needs so much ready cash to finance her own expenditures at home for herself and for our Allies that she must buy on credit from Canada, and from every other country where she can get credit.

Of course Great Britain's credit is so good that other countries, in order to get her trade, are quite as willing to give her credit as we are in Canada.

Canada wants to help Great Britain not only because Canada wants Britain's trade but because we are Canada and she is Great Britain—both members of the same great Empire, kin of our kin, our motherland.

For Canada it is both a filial and patriotic duty to supply Great Britain's war needs and remember, her needs are our needs. Also it is in Canada's self interest to supply those needs and thus keep open a market for our products.

* * *

Now, Britain needs our wheat, our cheese, cattle, hogs, and many manufactured articles.

Canada also needs many of these things—between the two it amounts to more than a million dollars a day in cash.

And the producers must be paid in cash.

Neither Canada nor Great Britain could go to a Canadian farmer and buy his wheat or his cattle on credit.

The farmer and all other producers might be ever so willing to give their country credit but they could not do it because they have to pay cash for wages, for rent, materials, etc. They must be paid in cash, or its equivalent.

So Canada says to Great Britain:—"I will lend you the money so that you can pay cash to Canada's producers for what you want.

"I will borrow this money from our own people just as you borrow money from your people.

"I will also borrow from the people of Canada money to pay cash for all the products that Canada, as well as Great Britain, needs in Canada."

That is Canada's practical, patriotic part in helping to win the war.

Without this credit the Canadian producer could not sell to Great Britain, and without these Canadian products the war would be prolonged.

So it is necessary for Canada to give to Great Britain the credit in order that Canada's own producers, who need a market, will have one; and in order that Great Britain which needs the products to win the war, will get them.

* * *

Now how does Canada get the money by which both Canada and Britain can pay cash for Canada's products?

By borrowing it from the people of Canada through the sale of Canada's Victory Bonds to be offered in November.

That is why Canada's Victory Bonds are offered to the people—to raise money to help to finish the war.

"Canada must keep her shoulder to the wheel even though it be a chariot of fire," and the way for Canada to keep her shoulder to the wheel is by buying

The Annual Meeting of the Women's Patriotic League was held in the Red Cross Hall, Cargill, Thursday afternoon, Oct. 18th. The following account of the work done during the year by the society was read by the Secretary:—142 flannel shirts, 70 surgical shirts, 43 pairs pyjamas, 21 quilts, 12 feather pillows, 25 sheets, 60 pillow cases, 1 pr. bath towels, 474 prs. socks, 10 prs. gloves, 181 boxes and parcels sent to soldiers overseas. The officers were re-elected, Pres., Mrs. T. Chisholm; Vice-Pres., Mrs. Cameron; Sec.-Treas., Maude McCoy.

The following resolution which was read by Mrs. Cameron, the vice-pres. was heartily adopted by the society:—Where-as we, the workers in the Patriotic League, have successful completed another year's work for the Empire, and where-as we feel therewith the experience of the past year behind us, we can and should improve in every phase of the work for the year upon which we have entered. We resolve that with the kindliest feelings towards our fellow workers, and the win-the-war slogan on our lips, to do our share of the work cheerfully; to make more personal sacrifices; to endeavour to strengthen our League for the benefit of the brave boys for whom we labor; to help carry on the work of the League in a strictly business-like way under those appointed to office, that we may prove ourselves worthy citizens of a great country whose Union Government is single-eyed to win the war. A motion was passed giving $25 to the work of the Y. M. C. A. at the front and $25 to the British Red Cross. The committees are as follows—Fund—Mesdames Kyle, Fowlie, Martin; Cutting and Buying—Mesdames Mathews, Kyle, Welsford; Distributing—Mesdames Chisholm, Cameron, Mathews, Kyle, Welsford; Yarn—Mrs. Mathews, M. CANADA AND THE WORLD'S SUPPLY OF WHEAT

(1) Reaping wheat in Portage-la-Prairie Manitoba. (2) Threshing wheat in Portage-la-Prairie.

It was with considerable satisfaction that readers in all Allied countries received the statement, made a short time ago by the Institute of Agriculture at Rome, that 1917 had seen an increase in the wheat crop of the principal countries of the world, outside of the Central Powers, of 2.3 per cent over 1916. These figures were based on returns from Spain, France, Scotland, Ireland, Switzerland, Canada, the United States, India, Japan and Algeria, which countries are this year estimated to show a total wheat production of 1,662,148,000 bushels. At the same time these same countries show an increase in their barley crop of 2.4 per cent; an increase in their rye crop of 10.7 per cent; an increase in their oat crop of 15.0 per cent, and an increase in their corn crop of 25.3 per cent. That such increases should be possible among nations, most of whom are engaged in war, is in itself a tribute to the productive energy of manhood.

The enormous total of 1,662,148,000 bushels of wheat is so great that it refuses to be grasped by the human mind without some form of comparison. If this crop of wheat were loaded into freight cars, 1,000 bushels to the car, and each car occupied forty feet of the railway track it would represent one solid loaded train 12,617 miles in length—more than enough to reach half way around the world at the equator. These loaded cars, without engines, would occupy seven-eighths the entire trackage of the Canadian Pacific Railway, known as the world's greatest transportation company.

There is, however, another point of view, and a very appropriate one at this particular period, when the agricultural countries are called upon to produce the utmost pound of food. While the countries mentioned have done well their accomplishment shrinks into insignificance when compared with their possibilities. For instance the three Canadian provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta could produce three times the total wheat crop above referred to. This statement may seem extravagant until submitted to the test of cold figures. Then we get data like this:

According to the Government of Canada there are in the provinces mentioned the following areas suitable for agricultural purposes:

Manitoba	24,216,000 acres
Saskatchewan ..	[illegible] "
Alberta..	102,217,000 "
	[illegible] "

The average wheat crop in these provinces for the last ten years has been: Manitoba, 18.29 bushels per acre; Saskatchewan, 18.44 bushels per acre; Alberta 20.19 bushels per acre. The average for the three provinces is therefore practically 19 bushels per acre. If you multiply the available acreage as given above, by 19 you will find that these provinces, if entirely cultivated, are capable of producing in an average year 6,154,948,000 bushels of wheat—considerably more than three times the total which is being produced this year, 1917, by Spain, France, Scotland, Ireland, Switzerland, Canada, United States, India, Japan and Algeria combined. The single province of Alberta can produce as much wheat as all of these countries and have more left over than was grown in 1917 in all Canada.

Of course, it is impossible, in a practicable manner, to put every arable acre of land in any country in wheat, but if we say for the sake of illustration that one-third of the arable land in these provinces is summer-fallowed, one-third sown to coarse grains or pasture, and one-third to wheat, the proportion that is sown to wheat will produce a greater crop than that already mentioned as being grown by all the countries before referred to.

These figures may be interesting generally for the great comparison which they afford but they must also carry the conclusion that the world is a very long way from having exhausted its food producing possibilities. Any scarcity of food production which may at present exist is traceable almost entirely to an improper distribution of population. In the older countries population is compelled to exist on such limited areas that production on a relatively large scale is impossible, whereas in the newer countries such as Western Canada the population is as yet totally insufficient to bring the country under cultivation. These are conditions which will doubtless right themselves; in fact, the process of correction is going on very rapidly, and, whatever difficulties may be experienced in feeding the world during the next few years, there can be no question that they will be solved as soon as sufficient population is found for the great open plains which are still awaiting the husbandman.

To Conserve Canada's Food

W. A. COOPER.

THE Canadian Pacific Railway Co. has played an important part in the interests of Canada in the world war in a great many ways, and has again been honored by the recent appointment of Mr W. A. Cooper, one of its prominent officials, to the Food Conservation Committee. Mr. Cooper has had considerable experience in dealing with foods, having been connected with the dining cars of the Canadian Pacific for twenty years, and his wide knowledge will be of much value to the Committee in the conservation of Canada's food stuffs. On this committee Mr. Cooper is associated with Judge Rose, Toronto; Mr. W. Wright, Toronto; and Miss Watson of the Guelph College. Mr. Cooper was born in 1871. After leaving school he commenced work with the Grand Trunk Railway as a junior clerk under the late William Wainwright, for whom later he acted as Private Secretary. Leaving that company in 1891 he joined the Canadian Pacific Railway service as Chief Clerk to the General Superintendent of the Eastern Division and subsequently assumed the duties of Inspector of Sleeping and Dining Cars, from which he graduated in 1897 to Assistant General Superintendent, and in 1905 was appointed Superintendent. In 1910 Mr. Cooper was promoted to General Superintendent, and during the past four years has been Manager of the Dining, Sleeping, and Parlor Cars, operating also the station restaurants, and train news service. For the years 1908, 09, and 10, Mr. Cooper filled the position of President of the American Association of Dining Car Superintendents.

"Me? What are you talking about?" He looked from one to the other of us, then retraced the few steps he had taken. "I believe you don't know me. I'm Randall, Danny Randall."

"Yes?" puzzled Johnny.

"Of Sonoma," added Randall.

"I suppose I should know you, but I'm afraid I don't," confessed Johnny.

Randall turned back to the tree beneath which lay our effects.

"I believe I'll just have a cup of coffee with you boys," said he.

We blew up the fire, scoured the frying pan, made ourselves food. Randall brought a pail of water. We all ate together, without much conversation, then lit our pipes and piled on dry wood to make a brighter friendship fire.

"Now, boys," said Randall, "I'm going to ask you some questions, and you can answer me or not, just as you please. Only I'll say its isn't just curiosity."

Johnny, who was studying him covertly from beneath the shadow of his hat, nodded briefly, but said nothing.

"How long have you been in the mines?"

"Since March."

"Since March!" echoed Randall, as though a little bewildered at this reply. "Yet you never heard— What camp?"

Johnny studied awhile.

"Hangman's Gulch for six weeks," said he, "then just prospecting."

"Where?"

"I don't believe I'll answer that question," replied Johnny slowly.

"But somewhere back in the hills?" persisted Randall.

"Somewhere back in the hills," agreed Johnny.

"Seems to me"— I broke in, but Johnny silenced me with a gesture. He was watching Randall intently and thinking hard.

"Then you have been out of it for three months or so. That explains it. Now, I don't mind telling you I came up here this evening to size you up. I heard about your row with Scarface Charley, and I wanted to see whether you were just another fighting desperado or an honest man. Well, I'm satisfied. I'm not going to ask you if you have much gold with you, for you wouldn't tell me, but if you have keep it with you. If you don't you'll lose it. Keep in the middle of the road and out of dark places. This is a tough camp, but there are a lot of us good men, too, and my business is to get us all to know each other. Things are getting bad, and we've got to get together. That's why I came up to see you. Are you handy with a gun?" he asked abruptly.

"Fair," said Johnny.

"You need to be. Let's see if you are. Stand up. Try to get the draw on me. Now!"

CHAPTER XX.

Johnny Gets Pistol Lesson.

JOHNNY reached for his pistol, but before his hand was fairly on the butt Randall had thrust the muzzle of a small revolver beneath his nose. His pale blue eyes that lit with concentration, his bleached eyebrows were drawn together. For an instant the thought flashed across my mind that this was a genuine holdup, and I am sure Johnny caught the same suspicion, for his figure stiffened. Then Randall dropped his hand.

"Very pretty," said Johnny coolly. "How did you do that? I didn't catch your motion."

"From the sleeve," said Randall. "It's difficult, but it's pretty, as you say, and if you learn to draw from the sleeve I'll guarantee you'll get the draw on your man every time."

"Show me," said Johnny simply.

"That gun of yours is too big. It's a holster weapon. Here, take this."

He handed Johnny a beautifully balanced small revolver, engraved and silver plated, with polished rosewood handle. This he showed Johnny how to stow away in the sleeve, how to arrange it, how to grasp it and the exact motion in snatching it away.

"It takes practice, lots of it and then more of it," said Randall. "It's worse than useless unless you get it just right. If you made a mistake at the wrong time the other man would get you sure."

"Where can I get one of these?" asked Johnny.

"Good!" Randall approved his decision. "You see the necessity. You can't. But a derringer is about as good, and Jones has them for sale. Now as for your holster gun. The whole trick of quick drawing is to throw your right shoulder forward and drag the gun from the holster with one forward sweep. Don't lift it up and out. This way." He snapped his hand past his hip and brought it away armed.

"Pretty," repeated Johnny.

"Don't waste much powder and ball shooting at a mark," advised Randall. "It looks nice to cut out the ace of hearts at ten yards, but it doesn't mean much. If you can shoot at all you can shoot straight enough to hit a man at close range. Practice the draw." He turned to me. "You'd better practice too. Every man's got to take care of himself these days. But you're not due for trouble same as your friend is."

"I'm obliged to you," said Johnny.

"You are not. Now it's up to you. I judged you didn't know conditions here, and I thought it only right to warn you. There's lots of good fellows in this camp, and some of the hard cases are a pretty good sort. Just keep organized; that's all."

"Now, I wonder who Danny Randall is?" speculated Johnny after our visitor had departed. "He talked as though we ought to know all about it. I'm going to find out from the first fellow I get acquainted with."

Next morning we asked the Morenas who was Danny Randall.

"El diabolo," replied Morena shortly and trudged obstinately away to his work without vouchsafing further information.

"Which is interesting, but indefinite," said Johnny.

The rest of the day and of several days following we spent in putting up our tent, ditching it, arranging our cooking affairs, building rough seats and generally making ourselves comfortable. We stretched these things to cover as long a space of time as possible, for we secretly dreaded facing the resumption of the old grind and postponed it as long as we could. A good deal of the time we spent at Yank's bedside, generally sitting silent and constrained, to the mutual discomfort of all three of us, I am sure. At odd intervals we practiced conscientiously and solemnly at the "draw." We would stand facing each other, the nipples of our revolvers uncapped, and would at the given word see who could cover the other first. We took turns at giving the word. At first we were not far apart, but Johnny quickly passed me in skill. I am always somewhat clumsy, but my friend was naturally quick and keen at all games of skill or dexterity. He was the sort of man who could bowl or play pool or billiards or anything else rather better than the average accustomed player the first time he tried. He turned card tricks deftly. At the end of our three days' loafing he caught me at the end of his pistol so regularly that there ceased to be any contest in it. I never did get the sleeve trick; but, then, I never succeeded in fooling the merest infant with any of my attempts at legerdemain. Johnny could flip that little derringer out with a twist of his supple wrist as neatly as a snake darts its forked tongue. For ten minutes at a time he practiced it, over and over, as regularly as well oiled machinery.

"But that proves nothing as to how it would work out in real action," said Johnny thoughtfully.

The afternoon of the third day while we were resting from the heat beneath the shade of our tree we were approached by three men.

"Howdy, boys?" said the first. "We hain't seen you around camp lately and thought mebbe you'd flew."

"We are still here," replied Johnny, with smooth politeness. "As you see, we have been fixing our quarters to stay here."

"Scarface Charley is here, too," observed the spokesman, "and he wanted me to tell you that he is going to be at the Bella Union at 8 this evenin', and he wants to know will he see you, and to come heeled."

"Thank you, gentlemen," replied Johnny quietly. "If by accident you should happen to see the desperado in question—who, I assume, can be in no way your friend—I hope you will tell him that I, too, will be at the Bella Union at 8 o'clock, and that I will come heeled."

"You'll be comin' alone," said the man, "or p'rhaps yore friend"—

"My friend, as you call him, is simply a miner and has nothing to do with this," interrupted Johnny emphatically.

"I thank you, sir," said the spokesman, rising.

The other two, who had throughout said no word, followed his example.

"Do you know Danny Randall?" said Johnny as they moved off.

If he had presented his derringer under their noses they could not have stopped more suddenly. They stared at each other a moment.

"Is he a friend of yours?" inquired the spokesman after an uncertain moment.

"He likes fair play," said Johnny enigmatically.

The trio moved off in the direction of town.

"We don't know any more about Danny Randall than we did," observed Johnny, "but I tried a shot in the dark."

"Nevertheless," I told him, "I'm going to be there, and you want to make up your mind to just that."

"You will come, of course," agreed Johnny. "I suppose I cannot keep you from that. But Jim," he commanded earnestly, "you must swear to keep out of the row unless it develops into a general one, and you must swear not to speak to me or make any sign, no matter what happens. I must play a lone hand."

He was firm on this point, and in the end I gave my promise, to his evident relief.

"This is our visitors' day evidently," he observed. "Here come two more men. One of them is the doctor. I'd know that hat two miles."

"The other is our friend Danny Randall," said I.

Dr. Rankin greeted us with a cordiality I had not suspected in him. Randall nodded in his usual diffident fashion and slid into the oak shadow, where he squatted on his heels.

"About this Scarface Charley," he said abruptly. "I hear he's issued his defi, and you've taken him up. Do you know anything about this sort of thing?"

"Not a bit," admitted Johnny frankly. "Is it a duel, and are you gentlemen here to act as my seconds?"

"It is not," stated the downright doctor. "It's a barroom murder, and you cannot get around it, and I, for one, don't try. But now you're in for it and you've got to go through with it."

"I intend to," said Johnny.

"It's not precisely that," objected Danny Randall, "for, d'ye see, he's sent you warning."

"It's about all the warning you'll get!" snorted the doctor.

"There's a sort of rule about it," persisted Randall. "And that's what I'm here to tell you. He'll try to come up on you suddenly, probably from behind, and he'll say 'draw and defend yourself,' and shoot you as soon after that as he can. You want to see him first; that's all."

"Thanks," said Johnny.

"And," exploded the doctor, "if you don't kill that fellow, by the Eternal, when you get a chance"—

"You'll give him a pill, doctor," interrupted Randall, with a little chuckle. "But look here," he said to Johnny, "after all, this sort of a mess isn't required of you. You say the word and I'll take on this Scarface Charley and run him out of town. He's a good deal of a pest."

"Thank you," said Johnny stiffly, "I intend to paddle my own canoe."

Randall nodded.

"I don't know as we can help you any more," said he. "I just thought you ought to be on to the way it is done."

"I'm obliged to you," said Johnny warmly. "The only doubt in my mind was when I was privileged to open."

"I'd pot him through the window with a shotgun first chance I got," stated the doctor. "That sort of a ruffian is just like a mad dog."

"Of course you would, doctor," said Randall, with just the faintest suspicion of sarcasm in his voice. "Well, I guess we'll be toddling."

But I wanted some information, and I meant to have it.

"Who is this Scarface Charley?" I asked.

"Got me," replied Randall. "You fellows seemed to recognize him. Only he's one of the gang undoubtedly."

"The gang?"

"Oh, the general run of hangers-on! Nobody knows how they live, but every one suspects. Some of them work, but not many. There are a heap of disappearances that no one knows anything about, and every once in awhile a man is found drowned and floating—floating, mind you!"

"What of that?" I asked. "Drowned bodies usually float."

"There's no miner in these diggings but has gold enough in his belt to sink him. If a man floats he's been robbed, and you can tie to that reasoning. And the fellows are all well mounted and given to mysterious disappearances."

"In other words," broke in the doctor, "they are an organized band of cutthroats and highway robbers making this honest camp a headquarters."

CHAPTER XXI.

The Fight.

WE ate a very silent supper, washed our dishes methodically and walked up to town. The Bella Union was the largest of the three gambling houses, a log and canvas structure some forty feet long by perhaps twenty wide. A bar extended across one end, and the gaming tables were arranged down the middle. A dozen oil lamps with reflectors furnished illumination.

All five tables were doing a brisk business. When we paused at the door for a preliminary survey the bar was lined with drinkers, and groups of twos and threes were slowly sauntering here and there or conversing at the tops of their voices with many guffaws. The air was thick with tobacco smoke. Johnny stepped just inside the door, moved sideways and so stood with his back to the wall. His keen eyes went from group to group slowly, resting for a moment in turn on each of the five impassive gamblers and their lookouts, on the two barkeepers and then one by one on the men with whom the place was crowded. Following his, my glance recognized at a corner of the bar Danny Randall with five rough looking miners. He caught my eye and nodded. No one else appeared to notice us, though I imagined the noise of the place sank and rose again at the first moment of our entrance.

"Jim," said Johnny to me quietly, "there's Danny Randall at the other end of the room. Go join him. I want you to leave me to play my own game."

I started to object.

"Please do as I say," insisted Johnny. "I can take care of myself unless there's a general row. In that case all my friends are better together."

Without further protest I left him and edged my way to the group at the end of the bar. Randall nodded to me as I came up and motioned to the barkeeper to set me out a glass, but said nothing. Ours was the only lot away from the gaming tables not talking. We sipped our drink and watched Johnny.

After surveying coolly the room Johnny advanced to the farther of the gaming tables and began to play. His back was toward the entrance. The game was roulette, and Johnny tossed down his bets methodically, studying with apparent absorption each shift of the wheel. To all appearance he was intent on the game and nothing else, and he talked and laughed with his neighbors and the dealer as though his spirit were quite carefree.

Our ten minutes we watched. Then a huge figure appeared in the blackness of the doorway, slipped through and instantly to one side, so that his back was to the wall. Scarface Charley had arrived.

He surveyed the place as we had done, almost instantly caught sight of Johnny and immediately began to make his way across the room through the crowds of loungers. Johnny was laying a bet, bending over the table, joking with the impassive dealer, his back turned to the door, totally oblivious of his enemy's approach. I started forward, instantly realized the hopelessness of either getting quickly through that crowd or of making myself heard and leaned back, clutching the rail with both hands. Johnny was hesitating, his hand hovering uncertainly above the marked squares of the layout, in doubt exactly where to bet. Scarface Charley shouldered his way through the loungers and reached the clear space immediately behind his unconscious victim. He stopped for an instant, squared his shoulders and took one step forward. Johnny dropped his chips on the felt layout, contemplated his choice an instant—and suddenly whirled on his heel in a lightning about face.

Almost With the Motion It Barked, and the Big Man Whirled to the Floor.

Although momentarily startled by this unexpected evidence that Johnny was not so far off guard as he had seemed, the desperado's hand dropped swiftly to the butt of his pistol. At the same instant Johnny's arm snapped forward in the familiar motion of drawing from the sleeve. The motion started clean and smooth, but half through caught, dragged, halted. I gasped aloud, but had time for no more than that. Scarface Charley's revolver was already on the leap. Then at last Johnny's derringer appeared, apparently as the result of a desperate effort. Almost with the motion it barked, and the big man whirled to the floor, his pistol, already at half raise, clattering away. The whole episode from the beginning occupied the space of two eye winks. Probably no one but myself and Danny Randall could have caught the slight hitch in Johnny's draw, and, indeed, I doubt if anybody saw whence he had snatched the derringer.

A complete silence fell. It could have lasted only an instant, but Johnny seized that instant.

"Has this man any friends here?" he asked clearly.

His head was back, and his snapping black eyes seemed to see everywhere at once.

No one answered or stirred. Johnny held them for perhaps ten seconds, then deliberately turned back to the table.

"That's my bet on the even," said he. "Let her roll!"

The gambler lifted his face, white in the brilliant illumination directly over his head, and I thought to catch a flicker of something like admiration in his passionless eyes. Then with his left hand he spun the wheel.

The soft, dull whir and tiny clicking of the ball as it rebounded from the metal grooves struck across the tense stillness. As though this was the releasing signal, a roar of activity burst forth. Men all talked at once. The other tables and the bar were deserted, and everybody crowded down toward the lower end of the room. Danny Randall and his friends rushed determinedly to the center of disturbance. Some men were carrying out Scarface Charley. Others were talking excitedly. A little clear space surrounded the roulette table, at which, as may be imagined, Johnny was now the only player. Quite methodically he laid three more bets.

"I think that's enough for now," he told the dealer pleasantly and turned away.

"Hullo, Randall! Hullo, Frank!" he greeted us. "I've just won three bets straight. Let's have a drink. Bring your friends," he told Randall.

We turned toward the bar, and way was instantly made for us. Johnny poured himself a big drink of whisky. A number of curious men, mere boys most of them, had crowded close after us and were standing staring at Johnny with a curiosity they made slight attempt to conceal. Johnny suddenly turned to them, holding high his whisky in a hand as steady as a rock.

"Here's to crime, boys!" he said and drank it down at a gulp. Then he stood staring them uncompromisingly in the face until they had slunk away. He called for and drank another whisky, then abruptly moved toward the door.

"I think I'll go turn in," said he. At the door he stopped.

"Good night," he said to Randall and his friends, who had followed us. "No, I am obliged to you," he replied to a suggestion, "but I need no escort," and he said it so firmly that all but Randall went back.

"I'm going to your camp with you, whether you need an escort or not," said the latter.

Without a word Johnny walked away down the street very straight. We hurried to catch up with him, and just as we did so he collapsed to the ground and was suddenly and violently sick. As I helped him to his feet I could feel that his arm was trembling violently.

"Lord, fellows! I'm ashamed," he gasped a little hysterically. "I didn't know I had so little nerve!"

"Nerve!" suddenly roared Danny Randall; "confound your confounded impudence! If I ever hear you say another word like that I'll put a head on you, if it's the last act of my life! You're the gamest little chicken in this roost, and I'll make you beg like a hound if you say you aren't!"

Johnny laughed a little uncertainly over this contradiction.

"Did I kill him?" he asked.

"No, worse luck; just bored him through the collarbone. That heavy little derringer ball knocked him out."

"I'm glad of that," said Johnny.

"Which I am not," stated Danny Randall with emphasis. "You ought to have killed him."

"Thanks to you I wasn't killed myself. I couldn't have hoped to get the draw on him with my holster gun. He is as quick as a snake."

"I thought you were going to bungle it," said Randall. "What was the matter?"

"Front sight caught at the edge of my sleeve. I had to tear it loose by main strength. I'm going to file it off. What's the use of a front sight at close range?"

I heaved a deep sigh.

"Well, I don't want ever to be so scared again," I confessed. "Will you tell me, by all that's holy, why you turned your back on the door?"

"Well," said Johnny seriously, "I wanted to get him close to me. If I had shown him that I'd seen him when he first came in the door he'd have opened fire at once. And I'm a rotten shot. But I figured that if he thought I didn't see him he'd come across the room to me."

"But he nearly got you by surprise."

"Oh, no," said Johnny; "I saw him all the time. I got his reflection from the glass over that picture of the beautiful lady sitting on the whisky barrel. That's why I picked out that table."

"My son," cried Danny Randall delightedly, "you're a true sport. You've got a head, you have!"

"Well," said Johnny, "I figured I'd have to do something; I'm such a rotten shot."

We slept late the following morning and awoke tired, as though we had been on a long journey.

"Now," said Johnny when our after breakfast pipes had been lit, "we've got to get together. There's one important question before the house—who and what is Danny Randall?"

"I agree with you there," said I heartily.

We separated until noon. Johnny returned promptly at 12.

"As to Danny Randall," he began at once, "origin lost in mists of obscurity. First known in this country as a guide to a party of overland immigrants before the gold discovery. One of the original Bear Flag revolutionists. Member of Fremont's raiders in the south. Showed up again at Sonoma and headed a dozen forays after the horse thieving Indians and half breeds in the San Joaquin. Seems now to follow the mines. Guaranteed the best shot with rifle or pistol in the state. Guaranteed the best courage and the quietest manners in the state. Very eminent and square in his profession. That's his entire history."

"What is his profession?" I asked.

"He runs the Bella Union."

"A gambler?" I cried, astonished.

"Just so, a square gambler."

I digested this in silence for a moment.

"Did you discover anything for yourself?" I asked at last.

"Best job ever invented," said Johnny triumphantly, "at three ounces a day, and I can't beat that at your beastly diggings."

"Yes?" I urged.

"I invented it myself, too," went on Johnny proudly. "You remember what Randall or the doctor said about the robberies and the bodies of the drowned men floating? Well, every man carries his dust around in a belt because he dare not do anything else with it. I do myself, and so do you, and you'll agree that it weighs like the mischief. So I went to Randall and I suggested that we start an express service to get the stuff out to bank with some good firm in San Francisco. He fell in with the idea in a minute. My first notion was that we take it right through to San Francisco ourselves, but he says he can make satisfactory arrangements to send it in from Sacramento. That's about sixty miles, and we'll call it a day's hard ride through this country, with a change of horses. So now I'm what you might call an express messenger—at three good ounces a day."

"But you'll be killed and robbed!" I cried.

Johnny's eyes were dancing.

"Think of the fun!" said he.

"You're a rotten shot," I reminded him.

"I'm to practice under Danny Randall from now until the first trip."

"When is that?"

"Do you think we'll advertise the date? Of course I'd tell you, Jim, but honestly I don't know yet."

The

One of the expre was a slight, dark youth wh never seen before. In the ot surprised to recognize Old Pine. He told me his pe "squatted" not far from Sa but that he had come up hills on summons by Danny The fact impressed me anew Randall's wide knowledge, fo Pines had not been long in the try.

The trip went through with dent. Johnny returned four er aglow with the joy of the turous ride through the dar bers aside, I acknowledge I sh have liked that job.

The first half dozen journe more or less secret, so that the service did not become known general public. Then the news bly leaked out. Danny Randall upon openly received shipment gave receipts at the Bella Unio seemed to me only a matter before the express messengers be waylaid, for the treasure th ried was worth any one's w spoke to Randall about it one

"If Amijo or Murietta or Di ple were in this part of the I'd agree with you," said he "but they are not, and there's in this lot of cheap desperadoes here that has the nerve. These boys have a big reputation as fi their horses are good, they cons vary their route and their tim starting, and Johnny in especial foxy head on him."

"The weak point is the place change horses," said I.

Randall looked at me quickly, though surprised.

"Why, that's true," said he "not doubt of it. But I've got five arm men there to look after just that. An another thing you must remember they know that Danny Randall is run ning this show."

Certainly, thought I, Danny at least appreciates himself. And yet, after all, I do not think he in any way exaggerated the terror his name inspired.

About this time a party of overland immigrants, headed by a man named Woodruff, were robbed of their cattle. Johnny and his men rounded up the thieves, killing three and placing two others, Carhart and Malone, under arrest. It was decided to try Carhart and Malone at a miners' meeting.

The meeting took place in the Bella Union, and the place was crowded the doors. All the roughs in town were on hand, fully armed, swearing, swaggering and brandishing their weapons. They had much to say by way of threat, for they did not hesitate to show their sympathies. As I looked upon their unexpected numbers an listened to their wild talk I must co fess that my heart failed me. Thoug they had not the advantage in num bers, they knew each other, were pr pared to work together, were, in gen eral, desperately courageous and reck less and imbued with the greatest co fidence. The decent miners, on th other hand, were practically unknow to each other and, while brave enoug and hardy enough, possessed neith the recklessness nor desperation of t others. I think our main weakn sprang from the selfish detachmen that had prevented us from knowing whom to trust.

I am not going to describe that most turbulent afternoon. The details are unessential to the main point, which was our decision. Counsel was appointed by the court from among the numerous ex-lawyers. The man who took charge of the defense was from New York and had served some ten years in the profession before the gold fever took him. I happen to know that he was a most sober minded, steady individual, not at all in sympathy with the rougher elements but, like most of his ilk, he speedily became so intensely interested in playing his profession that he forgot utterly the justice of the case. He defended the lawless element with all the tricks at his command. For that reason Woodruff was prevented from testifying at all, except as to his ownership of the cattle, so that the effect of his

CAN YOU FEED MORE LIVE STOCK?

IF SO YOU WILL BE INTERESTED IN CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH FREIGHT CHARGES WILL BE PAID FOR YOU ON CAR LOTS.

The Ontario Department of Agriculture is anxious that the splendid crops harvested this Fall should be used to best advantage. In many cases this can be done by feeding a few more head of cattle or sheep for breeding purposes. The Department therefore calls attention to the announcement of the Federal Minister of Agriculture offering to pay freight shipment on car lots from Eastern Stock Yards to country points. Please note these facts:—

Individually or in co-operation with your neighbors you can purchase a carload of heifers or ewes or both combined and have them shipped from any eastern Stock Yard to your station without any cost for freight charges. You will be required to make a declaration that the stock is for breeding purposes only.

Any farmer or drover can purchase a car load of cattle for feeding purposes on the Winnipeg market and have them shipped to any country point in Ontario upon payment of only one half the usual freight charges.

Feeding at the Toronto Stock Yards available at Reduced Rates and expert assistance is at disposal of farmers.

> "Every effort should be made to bring the surplus stock of some sections to the surplus feed of others. All indications point to a steady demand for the meat supplies of this country for some time to come."—Sir William Hearst, Ontario Minister of Agriculture.

The District Representative will assist you in organizing a co-operative car for your district if desired or in giving any other information.

Her Idea of Men

A little girl in our public school wrote the following composition on men: "Men are what women marry. They drink and smoke and swear, but don't go to church. Perhaps if they wore bonnets they would. They are more logical than women, also more zoological. Both men and women sprang from monkeys, but women sprang farther than the men."

Don't Miss the Point

There is a man in this part of the world who represents, to our way of thinking, a pretty good average of human nature. Whenever the preacher in his church delivers a very hot sermon against some special kind of sin, this man gets enthusiastic and goes around to the vestry to tell the preacher what a fine sermon it was. Then he goes home and repeats it to his brother, and they talk over the points and the people the sermon hit the hardest. But this particular man never sees when the sermon hits HIM.

Wants Mickle for Member

We have been informed there is a movement on foot to call a Win-the-War Convention in South Bruce and the party candidates for the Dominion House who were both nominated before there was any talk of Union Govt. ought both to be asked to resign and take their chances for re-nomination. It is also suggested that both nominees drop out and that the joint nomination be tendered to Mr. Mickle as a Union Govt. candidate. He did much to raising the Bruce Battalion and has been foremost in patriotic work in this County since the war began and it would only be fit and proper that a man who would so ably represent this riding should be elected by acclamation—Chesley Enterprise.

Laurier Compared To Gladstone.

The Canadian Gazette of London England, regards Sir Wilfrid Laurier as the incomparable leader of Canadian Liberalism. It likens him to Gladstone, and believes that he will continue to lead Liberals in Canada. The following is from the October issue of the semi-official journal.

There is much talk of impending political changes in Canada. Wise men will wait and see. For our part we shall be surprised if Sir Wilfrid Laurier does retire from the Liberal leadership, for the simple reason that no other Liberal can compare with him in command of the Liberal caucus and rank and file. He stands in Canadian Liberalism pretty much where Gladstone stood in English Liberalism in the late seventies. Others were put forward as Liberal leaders, but when the election came it was Gladstone or nothing.

Another $200 Touch

An echo of a Grey County liquor care was heard at Police Court here on Saturday when Wm. Price, general merchan of Elmwood, was fined $200 and costs as the result of evidence brought out a couple of weeks ago in Court at Owen Sound. It appears that Becker, an Elmwood citizen, living in the Grey County side of the village, was fined $200 for keeping liquor on other than private premises on information laid by Inspector Beckett of Grey County. On that occasion Beckett swore that he had taken nine bottles of beer carried them to the rear of Price store and placed then on a high shelf. Hearing of the evidence given by Becker, Inspector White laid a charge against Price. Price swore that he didn't know the liquor was there but that did not help him any. Magistraites Tolton and Richardson imposed a minimum fine of $200 and costs. O. E. Klein appeared for the prosecution, and H. G. Tucker of Owen Sound for the defendant.

Will Be Missed

Mr. Arthur Pengelly, who is leaving town to live on his farm near Eden Grove, was pleasantly surprised at the Methodist Quarterly Official Board Meeting on Monday night, when Mr. E. H. Sheffield, on behalf of the Board presented him with a nicely-worded address, while the Recording Stewart Mr. Fraser, handed him a fountain pen as a token of the Board's regard. The address follows:—

To Mr. A. P. Pengelly

Dear Friend and Fellow Worker:—

We the members of the Official Board of the Walkerton Methodist Church learn with very great regret that the relationship which has existed between us is severed by your removal from our town to the country. And while we are pleased to learn your purpose to retain your membership with us, and shall as often as possible join with us in worship, yet owing to distance it will be impossible for you to be with us as in the past, we cannot allow this opportunity to pass without expressing to you our appreciation of your long years of services to the church and official Board in the past. By your uniform courtesy and kindness you have won the love and respect of all the congregation.

We ask you to accept this present, not on account of its intrinsic value, which is but small, but as a slight token of our appreciation of your work in caring for the House of God, and as a member of this Board.

Signed on behalf of the Quarterly Board, C. W. Cosens, Chairman; F. J. Fraser, Recording Steward.

Go-To-Church Sunday

Rev. H. B. Storey, Methodist pastor of the Cargill Circuit, is holding "Go-To-Church Sunday" next Sunday on his three appointments. Mr. Storey is making a determined effort to get everybody out for service just for one Sunday, but it wont hurt any if the habit sticks a bit

A Son of Rest.

Frank Foster, a colored tramp was released from the County Gaol Tuesday morning after serving 30 days for vagrancy. Foster was a genuine son of rest. He slept 40 hours at a stretch before being released and appeared to be in a comatose condition. When the end of his term hove in sight, and no more work to do, he suddenly recovered his health and spirits.

Curling Club

The annual meeting of the Curling Club was held on Tuesday evening and the following officers appointed for the year 1917-18:—President, Ed. McConnell; vice-president, G. T. Rourke; secretary, E. H. Leeson; treasurer, E. A. McNab; managing committee, the officers and Messrs Collins, Lippert and McNamara; auditors, C. S. Stephan and A. P. Sieveright.

Wounded in Head and Thigh

Mr. Robt. Bryce had a telegram Monday morning from Ottawa stating that his son, Pte. John Charles Bryce, had been admitted to the 44th casualty clearing station on October 26th with gunshot wound in head and thigh. Charlie enlisted with the 222nd Batt'n at Baldur, Man., and has been Overseas about a year. He went to France with the 46th Batt'n. He is a former member of the Telescope staff.

Real Winter At Brandon.

Mr. S. W. Latchford of Brandon Man. who was here this week attending his mother's funeral, states that they have had a good taste of winter already in his district. A couple of weeks ago he had the unusual experience of being stuck in a snowbank with his car. It is now 28 years since Mr. Latchford left Walkerton. He has been travelling for a number of years out of Brandon.

Monday at 9 a m

The Bruce County organization for the Victory War Loan is complete and ready for the opening of the campaign, which opens in Bruce County and in fact through all Canada, next Monday morning at 9 o'clock. The canvassers in this county are representative men, who have the public confidence, and with the hearty co-operation of the people, they should roll up a total that will be a credit to this good old County.

Will Remove To Brantford

Mr. E. J. Glave, who has been inspector of munitions at Hamilton the past year, has taken a position at Brantford with the Singer Co. of New York, whom he represented in Walkerton for some years. Mrs. Glave and Miss Erma expect to join him at Brantford shortly. The removal of this estimable family from town will be greatly regretted by their many friends here. In the women's societies of the Methodist Church and in patriotic organizations of the town, Mrs. Glave will be specially missed.

THINGS ARE MOVING

Purvis Resigns and Tories Call Union Convention—Truax Mentioned as Borden's Choice in Ottawa Despatch — But Present Member Will no Doubt Stand Firm With Old Chieftain

A despatch from Ottawa to the Toronto Daily Star states that Reuben Truax M. P. will be designated by Sir Robert Borden as the Union Government candidate for South Bruce. Borden's action would be based on the fact that the sitting member for South Bruce supported the Military Service Bill at the last session and also on information which he would have in regard to the local situation in South Bruce. While Mr. Truax has not made any statement yet in regard to the latest turn in the political situation, it is doubtful if he would accept any such favor from the Prime Minister. Mr. Truax vigorously condemned the Borden Administration in the House last session. He would not be willing to follow the footsteps of Calder, Carvell, and others, who now apparently approve what a few months ago they bitterly attacked. Union Government would no doubt consider it a fine stroke to win even the Independent support of Mr. Truax, for the leading tories have openly expressed the opinion that Truax will have the predominating support of the people of this Riding in any event. Mr. Truax has been a lifelong friend and admirer of the old chieftain, Sir Wilfred Laurier, and is not likely to recede from the position he took in the House last session when he supported Sir Wilfred on everything but the Military Service Act which is now law.

Purvis Resigns

John Purvis, Conservative candidate has handed in his resignation to the Conservative Executive. For some months it had been rumoured that Mr. Purvis was going to "throw up the sponge" but he has stayed with it and it is now stated that the resignation was made with the idea of calling a Union convention. Yesterday the local press were handed an announcement calling a convention of all persons who will support the Union Government, to be held at the Town Hall, Walkerton, next Monday afternoon. In case it is decided to put forward a candidate against Mr. Truax, there is a strong likelihood that it will be Mr. Purvis.

Dentists Meet

The Dentists of this County held a meeting at the Hartley House on Friday afternoon and organized the Bruce County Dental Association, with Dr. W. B. Halladay of Walkerton, as President and Dr. C. L. Grant of Walkerton as Secretary Treasurer. The Association decided to adopt uniform fees such as already prevail in various Counties throughout Western Ontario.

Liberals Are Satisfied

The Liberal Executive of South Bruce met on Tuesday afternoon to consider an invitation from the Conservative Union Association to hold a Convention and some other matters. The Secretary was instructed to reply to the letter, declining the invitation on the ground that the Liberals have already the best win-the-war candidate in the riding in the person of Mr. R. E. Truax M. P. in whom they have every confidence.

Who Will Settle?

Joseph Foster of Pinkerton is suing the Canadian Express Co. in Division Court here for $32, the value of a keg of liquor shipped him and not delivered. It appears that Inspector White took the keg in charge at the Express Co. office but did not remove it from the premises. Somebody then came along and stole the booze. The Express Co. claims that they are not responsible for the keg was not in their custody. The case came up in Division Court here Friday before Judge Greig but was adjourned until next Court.

Fete Was Fine Success.

The ladies of the I. O. D. E. scored another splendid success in their Hallowe'en fete. The ladies are always planning something new and their enthusiasm never lags. The fete meant a tremendous amount of work but the ladies felt amply repaid by the fine encouragement which was given them by the public. No less than $164 was realized after paying expenses. Supper was first served in the upper storey of the Town Hall and afterwards the guests were entertained at Hallowe'en games in the auditorium, where witches and fortune-tellers held forth and fearsome ghosts silently directed the guests on their way.

VOLUME XLIX NUMBER 44
WALKERTON, NOVEMBER 8th, '17

EDITORIAL COMMENT

Toronto Saturday Night had a representative watching the proceedings at the recent bacon investigation at Toronto, and it now demands that Sir Joseph Flavelle be retired from the public position which he holds under the Government. This, however, will not satisfy the people. It would still leave the pork baron free to pocket enormous profits from his business. What is wanted is drastic action to stop war-time profiteering.

The article in Saturday Night to which we refer is as follows:

The resignation of Sir Joseph Wesley Flavelle from the chairmanship of the Imperial Munitions Board is past due. In political circles in Ottawa it is generally acknowledged that Sir Joseph, in his present position, is a serious encumbrance at this time. While the office which he fills is primarily the gift of the British War Office, there exists no doubt in the minds of the general public that Sir Joseph was the nominee of certain members of the Borden Government. This being the case, the Canadian public is calling loudly for the present Government to take such steps as are needed to insure his retirement.

How deep an impression this bacon inquiry has made on the public mind was shown in the recent canvass in Toronto for funds for the British Red Cross. Time and time again the collectors were met with rebuffs on the ground that the profiteers should pay, and not the public.

Never was the evidence of a witness more carefully staged than that of Sir Joseph Flavelle, who was in the box throughout the last day of the bacon inquiry. In place of following the usual course Sir Joseph was led over carefully prepared ground by his own counsel, in place of having the inquiry conducted by Government counsel as had been the mode of procedure up to the time Sir Joseph was called. It was as nice a bit of staging as has been seen at a like function for many a day, and Sir Joseph and his able counsel are to be congratulated thereon. It all gave Sir Joseph an opportunity of putting his best foot forward without hindrance of any sort whatever. Among other things, Sir Joseph accepted full responsibility for the huge profits which the William Davies Company has enjoyed during the last three years of war. Indeed, to use his own words he has no "qualms of conscience" in accepting the millions which were rendered possible owing to war conditions and a jug-handled contract with the British War Office.

The daily press reports of the investigation and public opinion as crystalized by the inquiry reflect the extent to which Sir Joseph Flavelle's able defence did or did not convince.

Certain basic facts of evidence stand out clear and sharp.

The William Davies Company, of which Sir Joseph Flavelle is the controlling head and guiding genius, has made approximately three and a-half million dollars out of the bacon supplied our soldiers in the trenches.

The William Davies Company secured from Dennis & Co., War Office buyers of bacon, a preferential contract, of which other powerful packers were unaware, and which guaranteed them against loss and insured them whatever profits they could make. This contract allowed them to pay whatever [illegible] was necessary to secure hogs in [illegible]lted quantities, with the natural [illegible]lt of running up the price of this ource of food in both Canada and he United States.

The William Davies Company pro uct, for private as well as war conumption, was forwarded on Governent vessels, while competitors were ompelled to get their product across e water as best they could during an ute shipping situation.

The William Davies Company built eir Montreal plant enormous vats [illegible],000 sides of bacon, at one e, for the purpose of "post curing" ich gave additional weight, and also abled them to hold bacon in a rising rket.

in these facts the Government unsel, Mr. J. W. Bain, K. C., in his ing address stated that the O'Con- charge of "profiteering" had been rly proven, and on these basic facts brought out in evidence "Saturday ht" also leaves its case to the ver- of the Court of Public Opinion.

Revisited Old Scenes

Mr. James Morrison was up from London a few days the past week to see his sister, Mrs. R. H. McKay, who has been so poorly. Mr. Morrison has retired from active business but is still hale and hearty and enjoyed meeting some of his old friends here and swapping reminiscences of former days. It is about twenty years since Mr. Morrison sold fanning mills throughout this district, for his brother-in-law, Mr. R. H. McKay.

Will they fight the Sein Feiners?

The 160th Battalion which forms part of the Fifth Division is still in England. Some suggest that the influence of Major Moffat is so strong with the War Office that he keeps the Bruce Boys from going to France. That seems a very improbable theory, for we do not think the influence of the commander of a battalion would go far towards changing the plans of the British authorities. If Major Moffat is as tired of life in England with its marches and manœuvres as his officers and the privates, they would be at the front long ago if they were not subject to a higher command. Captain Milton Aiken writing to the press says the delay has been caused by lack of reinforcements from Canada. The minds which are directing affairs in Great Britain understand the situation better than the [illegible] from Bruce who are criticising them. With 200,000 Sein Feiners enrolled for rebellion in Ireland perhaps the British policy may be to keep the Canadians in England ready to quell a Sein Fein rebellion in Ireland instead of sending English, Scotch or Welsh troops to fight the rebels.—Chesley Enterprise.

"BRUCE IN KHAKI"

Boys of the 160th Batt'n Launch a Cleverly-edited Weekly Newspaper of their own.

The first issue of the 160th Battalion's weekly newspaper, "Bruce In Khaki," reached Walkerton last week, and was of course eagerly devoured by the home folk. It is a neat little paper of 16 pages, magazine size, well-written, and is altogether a creditable number. We trust that the high standard reached in the first number will be more than maintained and wish the boys best luck in their commendable enterprise.

"Bruce In Kahki" is 3d. and is to be published weekly at Moss Lane, Godalmnig, England. The title page bears the crest of the 160th Battalion with the motto "Save, Serve, and Smile." The members of the Editorial Board have very modestly concealed their identity but we have a suspicion that the leading editorial, modestly headed the introductory note" which fills the front page sounds like Capt. Roy Whitehead. It is good enough to reproduce—

INTRODUCTORY NOTE

It is a great privilege to witness history in the making. It is a great privilege to have a part in the making of history. This latter honor is conferred upon the members of the Bruce Battalion. We are in the very midst of mighty world movements. Movements that topple over thrones, that shake society to its centre, that touch every country, that reshape nations, that alter world maps, that work reforms for society and that will produce a civilization superior to any the world has ever seen.

Never in history were there such times as these. Chronicles will attest this after the cataclysmic struggle has passed away and "the war drum throbs no longer and the battle flag is furled" in the parliament of the world and the federation of the world. We believe that when history is written and the new era ushered in, it will be found that the great work accomplished by the heroic lads of Bruce County will have aided in no small degree, the consummation of a victory that will lead to the unshackling of righteousness and liberty, and the fettering of an autocracy that would throttle freedom and clog the wheels of progress.

We believe, too, that the new venture - the publication of a battalion paper, will be an inspiration to our boys and of supreme interest to the folks in the old home land of Canada. Receive us kindly. Bear with our weakness. Indulge our failure, and cherish our virtues.

Editorials on subjects of interest to the soldiers are well written and there is a large quota of news from home taken from Bruce County newspapers. Personals items and jokes are a feature that takes up a goodly portion of the paper and are certainly a popular feature. We reproduce a few of these:—

The Lord is with us, so is his favorite platoon, "Number Nine."

Sad was the fate of poor Dunc. McDougall,
He went for a bath and slipped down the ploug'ole.

On the door of the editorial room hangs this motto: "Come in without knocking and go out the same way."

Have you noticed what a great improvement the grass along our front street has made? As a rule the 160th doesn't allow the grass to grow under their feet, but since moving into their new lines there has been a general clean up. The huts were done in pink and white, the doors and cavetroughs brightened up with paint, and everything in sight, even the dixie covers were decorated.

Someone wants to know what has held the 160th together so long. Ask the cooks—they make the pudding.

A barber shop has been opened on the ground floor of "Bruce in Khaki" building, Bruce street.

Sergt. Hendry, of the pay office, has figured that he is asked the question "When are we going to be paid?" 7200 times every month, and when he answers "to-morrow" the boys say "Oh, pshaw!"

Who is the private in No. 10 platoon, who, while we were out on a scheme, surrounded and captured a machine gun section?

B. S. M. Watts has returned to duty after spending a week in Bramshott Hospital, suffering from an attack of la grippe. Sergt. McIlurney took over the duties while B. S. M. was away.

Sergt. W. Ruhl returned last week from Aldershott hospital, where he was confined with a case of mumps.

Lance Corporal D. R. Loney has more patience than any man we know of. Last Saturday morning our typewriter went on the bum and after spending some time on it trying to get it to work, the editor said damn and chucked it in a corner. Dan came in and spent the afternoon pulling it to pieces and putting it together and at last succeeded in getting it in running order. If the boys will all dig in and give us a little assistance in time of need "Bruce in Khaki" will be a howling success.

Have you noticed how quick the Sergeant Tailor is at picking up things? He has a lovely assortment of potted plants.

+

Pte. V. G. Runstadtler has gone on a ninety-seven mile route march after winning a medal for barb wire entanglements. He says the medal is good for a pass when he gets home if his feet are not too sore.

Anyone who has any suggestion as to the menu for Christmas dinner kindly drop a note to the editor. Hoping this will slip the censor.

Boys, there's no use trying to flirt with the Arcadian girls they are all married. I met one out last Friday night with her "Hubby."

The following notice has been posted up in the mess room: "In order to prevent the men from carrying away the napkins and silverware from the tables, none will be put on."

When we were out on a bivouac we had breakfast one morning before daylight. John Molloy was sitting on the ground with a plate of hot stew between his feet when he noticed something dark drop into his plate. He speared at it with his fork but missed and out jumped a toad and hopped away. John said he wouldn't mind sharing his breakfast with a toad but it needn't have taken a bath in his stew.

When Sergt. James was phoning the orderly room sergeants of the Brigade asking them if they wore slacks while on duty, could he not have left the 1:30 out?

Could Sergt. Wells (3a.) tell us why it was necessary (after borrowing a Florence Nightingale lantern from the dame's mother to find his way home) to spend from 11.30 to 2. a.m. washing the mud off his boots and clothes?

(Advertisement)—The Celebrated Mud Baths at Elstead are specially recommended for sergeants. Equipment necessary for the course: All personal belongings, one Florence Nightingale lamp, a fatigue party to be warned one day previous to your return for boot cleaning. For recommendation apply to Sergt. Wells.

The Military Service Act, 1917

DON'T DELAY!
Do It TODAY

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT is passed; the Proclamation issued October 13th. It is now the bounden duty of every man in Class One to report for service or claim exemption. This includes all bachelors and widowers without children (not otherwise excepted) who were 20 years old on the 13th October, 1917, and whose 34th birthday did not occur before January 1st, 1917.

What To Do

Go to your Post Office and ask for the form for reporting for service or for claiming exemption. The form contains clear instructions for filling in. Do this not later than NOVEMBER 10th.

Beware of the Last Minute Rush

With so many thousands of reports and claims to be dealt with, the rush of Class One Men will grow heavier day by day. You will waste less of your time and serve your own best interests if you avoid the inevitable rush on the last days.

The law is being enforced with the Government and the People firmly behind it. Obey the law. Do it today.

BRILLIANT ARTIST DROWNED.

Tom Thomson Was an Interpreter of the Canadian Wilds.

Canadian art has sustained an irreparable loss in the death of Mr. Tom Thomson, one of Toronto's foremost landscape painters, who was drowned in Canoe Lake, Algonquin Park, on Sunday, July 8th, and whose body was recovered from the lake waters ten days later. A deep lover of nature and a true interpreter of the spirit of the North Country, it was Mr. Thomson's habit to spend many months of the year wandering alone in the wild stretches of Algonquin Park, and in painting the beauty-spots of the rugged Northland, he won himself fame as an interpreter of the wilds of Canada.

As an artist with an intimate knowledge of the many moods of the North Country—especially the sinister mood of nature—Mr. Thomson began to receive attention in Canadian art circles some four years ago, and since then his many pictures have been prominent in all the important exhibitions, so that when his tragic death occurred, he was looked upon as the one of the few young men whose work expressed the spirit of the wild and remote places of Canada.

Being one of the group of younger Canadian painters, Mr. Thomson's methods were conservatively modern, and his colors, while brilliant to the extreme, were seldom overdone. In his pictures he embodied the spirit of nature as few Canadian artists have done, and to quote the words of a well-known Toronto artist, "Mr. Thomson got that brooding 'something' of nature which can only be interpreted by either a poet or a poetic painter."

Although Mr. Thomson had only been painting for the past four or five years, his work was such as to attract immediate attention, and several of his larger pictures have been purchased by the Federal and Provincial Governments. Among these may be mentioned "A Northern Lake" and "A Northern River" in the National Gallery at Ottawa. Shortly before leaving the city on his last trip to Algonquin Park Mr. Thomson had finished one of his finest pictures, "Moonlight on a Northern Lake," which still hangs in the Studio Building, where he had his studio.

The tragic death of Mr. Thomson is deeply regretted by his fellow-artists, who view with deep sorrow the termination of a career so full of promise. Dr. D. J. MacCollom, president of the Arts and Letters Club, who was a personal friend of Mr. Thomson, said: "We considered him a painter of painters in Canadian art, and I believe that the secret of the greatness of his interpretations was that he loved the Northland and its greatness, and he painted because of that love. His work possessed that feeling which distinguishes the artist who paints for love from the one who paints from necessity. In his death Canadian art has lost one who would have achieved an international reputation."

World's Wheat Supply.

The world's wheat-supply outside the territory controlled by the Central Powers, which no longer report crop yields, is, by any methods of calculation entirely unsatisfactory, though the exact condition of affairs is extremely difficult to set forth in figures. The year 1915 produced bumper grain crops all over the world. Measured against that year, the wheat crop of last season is 400,000,000 bushels short, and an actual shortage exists in every country in the world. The falling off of production in Argentina from 172,000,000 bushels to 77,000,000 fully accounts for the embargo which that country has placed on the export of the great bread grain. Canada's wheat crop of last season, as measured against the year before, shows a falling off of nearly one half, and the wheat crop of the United States to only a little over 600,000,000.

This bad showing is largely the result of comparing extremes, for while the yield of 1915 was decidedly high, that of last year was abnormally low. When last season's crops is compared with the average for the five years before the war, it is found to be fully 200,000,000 bushels short—an illustration of the fact that variations as high as twenty-five per cent. may be due to season alone. In France, however, the yield dropped off over twenty-nine per cent. for the high year 1915, and over thirty-two per cent. for last year.—Eugene Davenport, in The Atlantic.

A Fiendish Device.

Another fiendish war device which the vandalistic ingenuity of the Hun has devised is the "crow's claw" which is distributed to all the German soldiers in France for the purpose of strewing over the ground they are forced by the Allies to retreat from. The menacing claws stick up and penetrate the feet of the unfortunate horses, crippling them. Allied soldiers, too, suffer severe injuries from these hidden weapons which are made of iron and supplied in huge quantities. Captain N. M. Grace, of the Royal Army Medical Corps, whose home is in Renfrew, Ont., and who made the above statement, is now home on furlough.

A Get-Rich-Quick Scheme.

Two young Irishmen in a Canadian regiment were going into the trenches for the first time, and their captain promised them five shillings each for every German they killed.

Pat lay down to rest, while Mick performed the duty of watching. Pat had not lain long, when he was awakened by Mick shouting:

"They're comin'! They're comin'!"

"Who's comin'?" shouts Pat.

"The Germans," replies Mick.

"How many are there?"

"About fifty thousand."

"Begorra," shouts Pat, jumping up and grabbing his rifle, "our fortune's made."—London Opinion.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson VI.—Fourth Quarter, For Nov. 11, 1917.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, Neh. i, 1-11—Memory Verse, 11—Golden Text, I John iii, 22—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

The name Ezra signifies "help," as in I Sam. vii, 12, margin, where we find the meaning of Ebenezer given as "the stone of help," and in the book of Ezra we saw how marvelously the Lord did help. For many years, more than forty, Isa. xli, 13, has been to me a strong message from God. "I, the Lord thy God, will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not, I will help thee." Nehemiah signifies "the comfort of Jehovah," and we certainly see it illustrated in the story of Nehemiah. Hachaliah signifies "hidden of Jehovah" and reminds us that our life is hid with Christ in God (Col. iii, 3), but it is sadly true that the God of all comfort (II Cor. i, 3) does not seem to be known as such by many of His people, and His comfort seems to be hidden from them. When the final restoration of Israel shall have come and they shall have seen and received their Messiah, then they shall be comforted indeed, according to Isa. xl, 1; lxvi, 13. We saw in a former lesson that Ezra found a very sad state of affairs in Jerusalem upon his return thither, and now, some thirteen years later, Nehemiah learned from some who had just returned that things were still very bad, the wall broken down, the gates burned and the people in great affliction and reproach (verses 2, 3).

It seems incomprehensible that it should be so after the return of Ezra with so much wealth and such authority from the king of Persia. But then, as now, patient continuance and constant zeal are necessary, and people are inclined to grow weary in well-doing. Nehemiah, like Ezra, was a man given to prayer and fasting, and these sad tidings sent him to the God of heaven with weeping and mourning (verse 4). Lesson verses 5-11 give us his prayer at that time. Another great prayer of his is found in chapter ix, and these, with such prayers as those of Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah and Daniel, are most helpful studies if we would learn how to pray (II Chron. xiv, 11; xx, 6-12; II Kings xix, 14-19; Dan. ix). The incomparable prayer is that of our Lord Jesus in John xvii.

Note in the prayer of our lesson the confession of sin and unworthiness which we all and always have reason to plead, even though, if we are true believers, we may say, as he did, "We are Thy servants and Thy people, whom Thou hast redeemed by Thy great power and by Thy strong hand" (verse 10). It is continually true that unless we honor God and magnify Him by a consistent life, a life of peace and joy and victory over besetting sins, we are bringing reproach upon His name, but not many lay it to heart, as Nehemiah did, not remembering that we are here in Christ's stead to represent Him in some measure as He did the Father. Nehemiah's reminding God that they were His people and His servants makes us think of Isa. lxii, 6, 7, margin, where we are called the Lord's remembrancers and told to take no rest and give Him no rest until He shall have made Jerusalem a praise on the earth. That will be the time of abiding comfort for Israel when God shall take away the rebuke of His people from off all the earth, and they shall not see evil any more (Isa. xxv, 8, 9; Zeph. iii, 14, 15). Few in these days seem to know or care that God has chosen Jerusalem to put His name there, that Israel shall yet blossom and bud and fill the face of the earth with fruit and that all nations shall go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, at Jerusalem, and the kingdom shall be the Lord's (Isa. xxvii, 6; Jer. iii, 17, 18; Zech. xiv, 16; Obad. 21).

In lesson verse 5 note his reverent adoration of God and compare Jer. x, 6, 7, 10; xxxii, 17; Ex. xxxiv, 6, 7; Acts iv, 24, and be encouraged to trust more fully the God of heaven and earth, the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy (I Tim. vi, 17). See how Nehemiah says again and again "My God" and "Our God" (ii, 8, 12, 18; iv, 9-20; vi, 16), reminding us of David's "our own God" (Ps. lxvii, 6), and of Thomas' "My Lord and my God" (John xx, 28). Day and night he continued to confess before God the sins of his people, taking his place with them as one of them, excusing nothing, palliating nothing (verses 6, 7). This is the only way of blessing (Prov. xxviii, 13; I John i, 9). He reminded God of His words to Moses, rested on the word of God and pleaded His faithfulness (verses 8, 9). This also did David in Ps. cxix, 49.

Having poured out his soul on behalf of his people, he asked a special favor on his own behalf, and yet it was for their sakes as their benefactor (verse 11). For this special personal favor he waited patiently month after month, though the distress at Jerusalem made it seem as if he needed an immediate answer. He had the ear of the King of kings for months before he found the opportunity to make request of Artaxerxes (compare i, 1, and ii, 1). Blessed are those who have learned to rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him (Ps. xxxvii, 7). Our attitude should always be expectant, but patient, not trying to make occasions or opportunities, but trusting God to do that, and then obedient to I Sam. x, 7.

Lost — In Aldershott, one Sergeant Mathieson. Finder please return to H. S. M. Watts or Sergt. Shewfelt.

By the way would some kind, well-meaning person ask the Chaplain to refrain from mentioning eats in the mess hall. He described a meal the other Sunday morning in such a realistic manner that quite a few broke out into a cold sweat. Maybe it is alright at times but not after pork and beans.

Major Moffatt and Captain Todd were seen standing in Bruce Street and the following conversation was overheard:

The Quartermaster: "What have you there?" pointing to a bundle under the Major's arm.

The Major: "This is print for making spreads for barber's chairs. It is guaranteed not to rip, tear, nor ravel run down at the heel, nor skid. You see the pattern with the dots and dashes, that was designed by a signaller, and the man who designed this beautiful "flower de lies" pattern, worked on it for forty-six years. I am going to try and sell the editor some for his operating table for operating on the exchanges. Every thread is inspected before leaving the factory.

Just then Big Steve came along and bought the whole bunch for the barber shop.

Sam Wisler, our comedian barber being at the ranges this week, the barber shop will be closed. There will be a 'air raid next week.

All the home papers should defend the boys over here against scandal mongers who have nothing else to do but start rumors about the health of other women's sons.

The 160th line up at the recent football game was as follows; — Goal, Sergt. C. E. Wendt, backs Sergt. W. Eidt, Cpl. C. G. Phillips half-backs, Pte. D. Cameron, Sergt. G. Shewfelt, Pte. Harold Miller, forwards, Pte. W. Schmidt, Corpl. N. Kaufman, Pte. F. Wharton, Corpl. B. Keeshig, Pte. D. A. McDougall.

Heard In Tailor Shop

When will we get the next Canadian mail? When are they going to issue more passes? Yes, I have noticed that Maj. Moffatt looks like Teddy Roosevelt? What time is it? No, I haven't got a match. Have you any cigarettes? I ate all the last cake mother sent me. How's your tobacco? He was only twenty minutes late. What time did you get in last night? We'll go to the concert in the Y. M. C. A. to-night. What is there for breakfast? It's just five and twenty past six. Did you shave to-day? Your tunic will be ready to-night.

Why is Sergt. Wright so interested in lectures on "Prisoners of War?" Is it because he has just been captured himself?

Going Overseas Soon.

Sergt. Chester Bryce, who has been in the United States Cavalry the past three years, expects to go Overseas shortly and writes his father, Mr. Robt. Bryce, East Ward, that he will be home on last leave next month. Chester is a member of Troop G, 21st Cavalry Kansas. Three of Mr. Bryce's sons are now in khaki, Walter and Charlie being now in France.

Died At Brandon.

A former Walkerton young lady, Mrs. Robinson, nee Maude Fountain was sadly bereaved by the death of her husband at Brandon, Man. on Oct 18th Death occurred rather suddenly from heart failure after he had been confined to his bed several weeks with other illness. The deceased was a Sergeant in the Salvation Army and the funeral was conducted by the Army. The Band playing the Dead March in Saul as the cortege proceded to the cemetery.

EDITORIAL COMMENT

INVEST your savings in Canada Victory Loan. It's good business and good patriotism.

A Kansas young man failed to registered, and when he was called to account for it, he produced the family Bible, which showed his age to be 32. The matter did not end there, however, for the officer went a little further and discovered from the same family record that the young man had a sister who was only three months older than he was. If you want to change the family record, it is necessary to go through and move the whole family up a notch

IF you could suppose that a man started 460 years before the birth o of Christ and saved one dollar a day every day, including Sundays and holidays, right up to the end of the present year, 1917, he would then have only as much as Sir Joseph Flavelle has cleared in one year as profits in bacon, the approximate figure being $871,000. A great many people are waiting to see what the Goverment is going to do about the bacon business. — Goderich Signal

AS one man quoted by a Toronto paper expressed it, the union Government's statement of policy reads like the advertisement of a patent medicine nostrum warranted to cure all ills to which the flesh is heir. It does not promise to remove corns, warts or bunions, but that is an omission that can easily be remedied. Possibly the framers of the declaration aimed to produce a document that would arouse a minimum of controversy and would soon be forgotten: if this was the aim they have succeeded admirably

MR. Stewart Lyon, editor of the Toronto Globe, who was rendered splendid service to the Canadian press as its correspondent on the front since last April, has returned. His message is that the men who are left of Canada's first contingent should have a holiday — not in Paris or London, but right here in Canada, and that it should be a long one, too. If ever men need a rest it is those who are left of Canada's first 30,000. If the plan can be worked without interfering with military operations, it should go into effect. And perhaps there wouldn't be a royal welcome home for those veterans!

THE best thing about a Canadian war loan is that it helps the boys in France. The next best thing about it is that you get your money back with interest.

THERE are now 3 candidates in the field in S. Bruce. Mr. Baechler has nominated himself and he surely has as much, if not more right to do that than the committee of two meetings in Toronto has to say who shall be the Union Candidate in each riding in this province. — Chesley Enterprise.

WRITING of conditions in France, Owen Johnston says in Colliers that there has been an increase in prices, naturally, but the amazing thing is that to-day one can live in France one-third to one-half cheaper than in the United States under present extortionate prices Shoes, which in this country sell at $8, $10 and $12, could be bought at $6 and $7.

Sir Wilfrid's Program

"To find the men, money and resources necessary to insure the fullest measure of support to our heroic soldiers at the front."

To form a National Government composed of the ablest men of the country to carry out this policy.

To make the welfare of the fighting forces of the country the first consideration.

To stop profiteering even if it becomes necessary to establish Government control of munitions factories.

To take drastic steps to reduce the high cost of living.

To increase, double and quadruple the output of all that may be necessary for marching and fighting armies.

To remove the tariff on agricultural implements and other essentials for greater production.

To remove the excess tariff wall which contributes to the high cost of commodities, including the war tariff against imports from Britian.

To submit the question of further operation of the present Military Service Act to the people through a referendum

To organize and carry a strong appeal for voluntary recruiting, which has not had a fair trial.

[illegible] minate the danger of "a dispirited Canada at this critical hour of our history."

To reopen and review the Canadian Northern deal.

To promote a strong and progressive policy of immigration in order to build up the country after the war.

To replace the returned soldiers in civil life and enable each man if possible to become self-sustaining.

To provide more adequate measure for the care and comfort of soldiers' dependents as a national obligation, not through the medium of public benevolence or charity.

Why does Canada Raise Money by Selling Bonds?

BONDS are issued payable in ten or twenty years, as the case may be.

It means that repayment of the money will be spread over ten or twenty years instead of being raised by taxation to meet current expenditures.

To raise by taxation all the money as fast as it is needed to carry on Canada's share in winning the war, would be an unbearable burden upon the people.

It would mean that more than a million dollars a day would have to be raised right now.

But to raise money by selling Canada's Victory Bonds means that those of the next generation who will benefit by the sacrifices this generation is making;

—who will share in the freedom this generation is fighting for and largely paying for—will also pay their share.

* * *

And when you buy Canada's Victory Bonds you make a first-class business investment in a security that is absolutely safe, likely to enhance in value after the war, and bearing a good rate of interest.

You help the country by keeping open the British market for Canadian products and this helps the general welfare in which you share.

* * *

And again, every Canadian who buys a Victory Bond becomes a financial partner or backer of Canada in the war.

When you buy a Canada Victory Bond you give a personal pledge that you are going to help to win the war.

Every man and woman in Canada can help to win the war by buying Canada's Victory Bonds. And Canada wants the personal, individual interest and co-operation of every man and woman in the country.

The buying of Victory Bonds by the whole people unites them in a determination to win the war.

Every purchase of Canada's Victory Bonds is a blow for freedom against the tyranny of German Kultur.

Every bond sold is a new guarantee that Canada is in the war to the finish, until victory is with the Allies and the world has been made safe to live in.

Every bond you buy is a new pledge that Canada will remain true to herself, the Empire, the Allies and to freedom's cause.

So it is both patriotic and good business to

HANOVER

Hydro was turned on at Hanover last hursday.

Hanoverians will be pleased to learn hat another industry is apout to start ere, a knitting concern. Mr. George ood of the Hood Knitting Co., Toronto as rented the second flat of the eutschmann building and is at present ngaged installing machinery in order o commence the manufacture of knitt- d goods.

The Hanover Continuation School cored another big success in the Han- over town hall on Friday night of last week when they rendered a parody of Shakespeare's play, "The Merchant of Venice". Despite their amateur status the students all acted their different parts to perfection, and the play, which was preceded by the presentation of certificates, medals, etc., to last year's successful scholars, was heartily enjoyed by the large crowd present. As a result of their efforts the students cleared about $96 which will go towards paying for the piano which they installed in the Assembly Hall of the school some time ago.

Word was received last Thursday that Major Jaffray Eaton, formerly second in command of the 147th Greys was killed in action in his first fight in France. He was the only child of the late Christopher Eaton of Owen Sound and a grandson of the late Senator Jaffray, president of the Toronto Globe.

Mrs. F. X. Korman received a letter from her son, Lieut. Claude Korman, last week in which he stated that he had been sent to France. He is the first officer of the 248th battalion to cross the channel.

GLAMIS

Miss Retta McKinnon spent the week-end with her friend, Miss R. Matheson of Tiverton.

Miss Irene Reith returned home to Toronto on Thursday.

Mr. A. Bell of North Bruce occupied the pulpit in St. Paul's Church on Sunday.

Mrs. K. Francis of Toronto is visiting relatives here.

Rev. P. Reith has been spending a few days in Toronto.

Miss Susie Thompson visited at Mrs. McLaren's, near Tiverton last week.

Mr. James Gilchrist of Kincardine Sundayed at his home.

Halloween passed off very quietly in the burg this year.

Miss Mary A. McKinnon left last week to work in Flint, Mich.

Mr. James McLennan was confined to the house last week with injuries sustained in an accident last Thursday.

On Friday evening The Red Cross Workers and friends packed 30 Xmas boxes for the Glamis boys Overseas.

There are three threshing machine in this locality now. It seems either a feast or a famine.

Mrs. Cartright returned to her home in Micton West this week after a months visit at Misses Hawson.

Mr. Alex. McInnis of Washington who is home on a visit accompanied by his brother John N, 2nd Con Bruce is away on visit to friends at Priceville.

Mr. and Miss Walker of Teeswater were Sunday visitors at Messrs W. T. Stewart, and Thos. H Purdy.

CHEPSTOW

Class IV—John Doyle, John McKinnon, James O'Hagan, Maurice O'Hagan, Anthony Dieboldt (absent for two examinations.

Class III—Margaret O'Hagan, Andrew Doyle, Laura Kroeplin, Venetia O'Hagan, John Quinlan, Viola Cassidy, Harold O'Hagan.

Mary Doyle, Joseph O'Hagan, Harry Kroeplin.

Class I—Beatrice Kroeplin, Jessie McKinnon, Agnes O'Hagan, Margery O'Hagan, Loretto Cassidy.

Pupils who missed no days in mouth, Laura Kroeplin, Jessie McKinnon and Beatrice Kroeplin.

L. Fitzpatrick, Teacher.

GREENOCK GORE

Hallowe'en passed off very quietly around these parts.

Mr. Leslie and Miss Olive Walker of Teeswater Sundayed at Mr. W. T. Stewart's.

Quite an excitement was caused by the disappearance of Mr. Charles Russell. Large search parties were to be seen in all directions, nobody doing any good.

Miss Florence Webb Sundayed with her friend Miss Marguerette McLennan.

Mr Wilfrid Moffatt is just recovering from a bad attack of the mumps.

Miss Marion Fitzsimmons spent Sunday with Miss Abbie Symons 4th, of Bruce.

Mr. William Webb has returned home from the West, where he spent some time with his brother, and also helping along the good cause in the harvest field.

The boys are all taking a day off in Walkerton this week for their Medical Examination, many of them are wondering what their fate will be.

BRANT AVENUE

Mr. Frank Sutter spent Sunday in Chepstow.

J. J. Ernst and his mother spent last Tuesday in Hanover on business. He reports muddy roads no matter what direction you may drive.

John Zettler had his pig stable cemented last week as Jack was tired of having the hogs chewing up the wooden floors and have to go hunting around to find out where his hogs would be. He got George Yost of Mildmay to do the cement work and he made a fine job of it.

Jos. Zettler's auction sale of cattle a Formosa last Saturday was well patronized and big prices realized.

The potato buyers picked up most of the "spuds" which could be spared handy in this vicinity.

Flight Lieut. Chas. Uhrig, who is training at Camp Borden visited at P. Scanlan's last Sunday. His home is at Winkler, Man.

Lots of rain these last few weeks for it put lots of our agriculturalists behind with their root crop and some other odd jobs.

Quite a few farmers have some or all of their "murphies" to dig yet as lots of patches were too wet. Above all they should be looked after before winter weather comes on them, like we have had lately.

At last W. Roumey's threshing outfit, of Cargill, pulled in here and helped to take some of the worry off their minds by filling the granaries up.

Wonder what's going to happen soon in the weather line? Last Saturday two bunches of wild ducks were flying south-westerly and shortly after a big flock of wild geese sailed north. What have the "prophets" to predict this time?

A lot of sports in this vicinity took Monday off and went to see the Guy Bros. concert in town and some were smiling for a few days after. Must have seen some funny sights there, ha ha.

Mr. Andrew Oberle is closing down his big "piggery business" as it's too inconvenient and cold in winter time and Mr. George Siegfried, who has been looking after the hog business is going to help his brothers in the bush on the farm they purchased some time ago near Markdale. No doubt they'll make a success as they are very industrious workers. That's what counts nowadays.

The many friends of Mr. John Whitehead were sorry to hear that he was laid up (in bed) under the doctor's care. We wish him a speedy recovery.

A few of the farmers are thinking of investing in an auto. It's easy made money, sometimes, to buy certain goods six months ahead, as everything advances quite rapidly in these war times.

GREENOCK

The Box Social held here last Friday evening in aid of the Red Cross was a fine success. There was a good crowd present, an excellent program, and the crowd bid generous on the boxes, the gross proceeds amounting to $100. Mr. Joe Carter made a good Auctioneer and Alex. McLennan was right at home in the chair. The program included solos by Miss Viola Cunningham, comic and patriotic songs by Herb. Hauch, solos by Miss Ermel, excellent drills by the school children who had been trained by their teacher, Miss McGill. There were also some good dialogues in which the young people of the neigherhood showed their ability. Everybody had a good time.

FORMOSA

R. E. Truax, M. P., was a visitor in our burg Thursday.

Quite a number of farmers attended J. J. Zettler's cattle sale at A. Opperman's last Saturday.

Leander Kuhry and Mathew Kempel arrived home from the West Saturday

Ed. Massel bought a fine horse at J. J. Zettler's sale Saturday

Joe Meyer of Gagetown, Mich., who was visiting friends here left for his home last week accompanied by hi brother Louis.

— W-T —

The weather made a great change on Friday. This must be Indian Summer.

Everybody is busy these days taking in their roots.

The aeroplane which landed in W. Kuntz's field was removed on Saturday.

Mr and Mrs. John Oehring of Hanover Sundayed at Joseph Dentinger's.

CAPE CROKER SOLDIER

Mr C A Fox had a nice letter from Corp. Kieshig one of the 160th boys from the Cape Croker Reserve, which we reproduce herewith We doubt if there are many in the battalion who can beat Corp. Kieshig in penmanship. His writing is a credit to himself and the school from which he graduated.

Dear Friend & Sir:—

It's likely this will give you a big surprise. Anyhow, you will not be too stunned to read the contents. Moreover it will be a pleasure to hear from an old friend who is Overseas.

First of all I ask pardon for being so negligent, there is whatever, no way to excuse myself.

I must say we are so happy to still be in existence. We really have been pretty fortunate to stay here this length of time. No one understands why. The whole thing may be a blessing, you know. Therefore 'twould be a sin to abuse or complain about it. It is trying for everyone of us, for the work we have to do all the time. What can we do? That's all in the game with the Army.

Anyone of the lads can tell you that we all feel tired, to be more brief, "fed up." There isn't a chap in our midst that doesn't wish we were going to fight. We will welcome the day chosen for us to cross over the channel. Many of us would have been likely over there, too, long ago but for the thoughts of those at home. 'Tis better to stay here as long as they'll let us, and the worry and anxiety isn't so heavy for the loved ones. We will suffer for them.

The Bruce Battalion has indeed won much admiration and reputation. It has set a record which no other unit will excell. The County has indeed given a sturdy and husky bunch of young men who, too, are working for the name of the regiment. Every man seems to have an amount of viger, ambition and interest. It's a very powerful human machine. I can say, with boa sting, whenever it be our turn to clash arms, each man will acquit himself in crashing down militarism for liberty and freedom. No doubt you are aware of the facts, how many tribulations we all have undergone, especially in sickness. The climate had something to do with that but now we're used to it all.

The country is noted for sceneries, roads, ancient buildings, Lords' estates and all the government buildings. Everything that has met our eyes gives much wonderment. It has broadened our minds.

In a week or two the year will soon swing around like a clock, marking the day since we landed here. Who ever dreamt being here so long? God only knows when we will come back, we don't. Without any expectation it's nothing lost. If we say that we may spend another Xmas dinner here in this camp.

If everything goes O. K. there will be a pass for me to Scotland where I've longed to go. We would have gone before had they let us go. 'Twould take much paper and time to relate you all. So do not be offended.

Trusting to the Lord that all goes well henceforth. I may have another occasion to send you a few more lines, but am now coming to an end.

With Best Wishes and Good Luck
Yours truly,
No 872192, Corp. B. R. Kieshig.

"I FEEL LIKE A NEW BEING"

"FRUIT-A-TIVES" Brought The Joy Of Health After Two Years' Suffering

MADAM LAPLANTE

85 St. Rose St., Montreal. April 4th.

"For over two years I was sick and miserable. I suffered from constant Headaches, and had Palpitation of the Heart so badly that I feared I would die. There seemed to be a lump in my stomach and the Constipation was dreadful. I suffered from Pain in the Back and Kidney Disease.

I was treated by a physician for a year and a half and he did me no good at all. I tried "Fruit-a-tives" as a last resort. After using three boxes, I was greatly improved and twelve boxes made me well. Now I can work all day and there are no Headaches, no Palpitation, no Heart Trouble, no Constipation, no Pain or Kidney Trouble and I feel like a new being—and it was "Fruit-a-tives" that gave me back my health".

pathetic story was lost. Dr. Rankin had no chance to appear.

We retired to Randall's little room to deliberate. Not a man of the twelve of us had the least doubt as to the guilt of the prisoners. We took a ballot. The result was eleven for acquittal and one for conviction. I had cast the one vote for conviction.

We argued the matter for three hours.

"There's no doubt the men are guilty," said one. "That isn't the question. The question is, dare we declare it?"

"It amounts to announcing our own death sentence," argued another. "Those fellows would stand together. But who of the lot would stand by us? Why, we don't even know for sure who would be with us."

"This case ought never to have been tried by a jury," complained a third bitterly. "It ought to have been tried in a miners' court, and if it hadn't been for those soft heads who were strong for doing things 'regularly' instead of sensibly we'd have had it done that way."

"Well," said an older man gravely, "I agree to that. I am going to be governed in my decision not by the merits of the case, but by the fact that I have a family back in the states. I consider my obligations to them greater than to this community."

I reasoned with them for a long time, bringing to bear all the arguments I had heard advanced at various times during our discussions in Danny Randall's back room. At last, seeing I could in no manner shake their resolution, I gave in. After all, I could not blame them. The case was to them only one of cattle stealing. They had no chance to realize that it was anything more. Without solicitation on my part they agreed to keep secret my opposition to the verdict of acquittal.

Our decision was greeted by wild yells and the discharge of pistols on the part of the rough element. The meeting broke up informally and in confusion. It would have been useless for the presiding officer to have attempted to dismiss court. The mob broke through en masse to congratulate the prisoners. Immediately the barkeepers were overwhelmed with work. Here and there I could see a small group of the honest men talking low voiced, with many shakes of the head. Johnny, Old and Cal, who had attended with his arm slung up, had their heads together in a corner. Danny Randall, who, it will be remembered, had not appeared publicly in any way, stood at his customary corner of the bar watching all that was going on. His gamblers were preparing to reopen the suspended games.

After conferring together a moment the three express messengers made their way slowly across the room to the bar. I could not see exactly what happened, but heard the sudden reverberations of several pistol shots. The lamps and glasses rattled with the concussion, the white smoke of the discharges eddied and rose. An immediate dead silence fell, except for the sounds made by the movements of those seeking safe places. Johnny and his two friends, shoulder to shoulder, backed slowly away toward the door. Johnny and Old presented each two pistols at the group around the bar, while Cal, a revolver in his well hand, swept the muzzle slowly from side to side. Nobody near the bar stirred. The express messengers backed to the door.

"Keep your heads inside," warned Johnny clearly. On the words they vanished.

Immediately pandemonium broke loose. The men along the bar immediately became very warlike, but none of those who brandished pistols tried to leave the building. From the swing and sway of the crowd and the babel of yells, oaths, threats and explanations I could make nothing. Danny Randall alone of all those in the room held his position unmoved. At last a clear way offered, so I went over to him.

"What's happened?" I shouted at him through the din.

Danny shrugged his shoulders.

"They killed Carhart and Malone," Danny replied curtly.

Although for the moment held in check by the resolute front presented by these three boys, the rough element showed that it considered it had won a great victory and was now entitled to run the town. Members of the gang selected what goods they needed at any of the stores, making no pretense of payment. They swaggered boldly about the streets at all times, infested the better places, such as the Bella Union, elbowed aside insolently any inoffensive citizen who might be in their way and generally conducted themselves as though they owned the place. Robberies grew more frequent. The freighters were held up in broad daylight; rumors of returning miners being relieved of their dust drifted up from the lower country; mysterious disappearances increased in number. Hardly an attempt was made to conceal the fact that the organized gang that conducted these operations had its headquarters at Italian Bar. Strange men rode up in broad daylight, covered with red dust, to confer with Morton or one of the other resident blackguards. Mysteriously every desperado in the place began to lay fifty dollar octagonal slugs on the gaming tables, product of some lower country atrocity.

The camp soon had a concrete illustration of the opinion the roughs held of themselves. It was reported quietly among a few of us that several of our number had been "marked" by the desperadoes. Two of these were Joe Thompson, who had acted as counsel for the prosecution in the late trial, and Tom Cleveland, who had presided, and presided well, over the court. Thompson kept one of the stores, while Cleveland was proprietor of the butcher shop. No overt threats were made, but we understood that somehow these men were to be put out of the way. Of course they were at once warned.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Rule of the Lawless.

AMONG the occasional visitors to camp was a man who called himself Harry Crawford. He was a man of perhaps twenty-five years, tall, rather slender, with a clear face and laughing blue eyes. Nothing in his appearance indicated the desperado, and yet we had long known him as one of the Morton gang. This man now took up his residence in camp, and we soon discovered that he was evidently the killer. The first afternoon he picked some sort of a petty quarrel with Thompson over a purchase, but cooled down instantly when unexpectedly confronted by a half dozen miners who came in at the opportune moment. A few days afterward in the slack time of the afternoon Thompson, while drinking at the bar of the Empire and conversing with a friend, was approached by a well known sodden hanger-on of the saloons.

"What are you fellows talking about?" demanded this man impudently.

"None of your business," replied Thompson impatiently, for the man was a public nuisance and besides was deep in Thompson's debt.

The man broke into foul oaths.

"I'll dare you to fight!" he cried in a furious passion.

Facing about, Thompson saw Crawford standing attentively among the listeners and instantly comprehended the situation.

"You have the odds of me with a pistol," said Thompson, who notoriously had no skill with that weapon. "Why should I fight you?"

"Well, then," cried the man, "put up your fists! That'll show who is the best man!"

He snatched off his belt and laid it on the bar. Thompson did the same.

"Come on!" cried the challenger, backing away.

Thompson, thoroughly angry, reached over and slapped his antagonist. The latter promptly drew another revolver from beneath his coat, but before he could aim it Thompson jumped at his throat and disarmed him. At this moment Crawford interfered, apparently as peacemaker. Thompson was later told secretly by the barkeeper that the scheme was to turn him into a pistol fight in the street, when Crawford would be ready to shoot him as soon as the first shot was fired.

On the strength of this interference Crawford next pretended to friendship and spent much of his time at Thompson's store. Thompson was in no way deceived. This state of affairs continued for two days. It terminated in the following manner: Crawford, sitting half on the counter and talking with all the great charm of which he was master, led the subject to weapons.

"This revolver of mine," said he, at the same time drawing the weapon from its holster, "is one of the old navy model. You don't often see them nowadays. It has a double lock." He cocked it as though to illustrate his point, and the muzzle, as though by accident, swept toward the other man. He looked up from his affected close examination to find that Thompson had also drawn his weapon and that the barrel was pointing uncompromisingly in his direction.

For a moment the two stared each other in the eye. Then Crawford sheathed his pistol with an oath.

"What do you mean by that?" he cried.

"I mean," said Thompson firmly, "that I do not intend you shall get the advantage of me. You know my opinion of you and your gang. I shall not be shot by any of you if I can help it."

Crawford withdrew quietly, but later in the day approached a big group of us, one of which was Thompson.

"There's a matter between you and me has got to be settled!" he cried.

"Well, I can't imagine what it is," replied Thompson. "I'm not aware that I've said or done anything to you that needs settlement."

"You needn't laugh!" replied Crawford, with a string of insulting oaths. "You're a coward, and if you're anything of a man you will step out of doors and have this out."

"I am, as you say, a coward," replied Thompson quietly, "and I see no reason for going out of doors to fight you or anybody else."

After blustering and swearing for a few moments Crawford withdrew. He made no attempt to fight, nor do I believe his outburst had any other purpose than to establish the purely personal character of the quarrel between Thompson and himself. At any rate, Thompson was next morning found murdered in his bunk, while Crawford had disappeared. I do not know whether Crawford had killed him or not. I think not.

About this time formal printed notices of some sort of election were posted on the bulletin board at Morton's place. At least they were said to have been posted and were pointed out to all comers the day after election. Perhaps they were there all the time, as claimed, but nobody paid much attention to them. At any rate, we one day awoke to the fact that we were a full fledged community, with regularly constituted court officers, duly qualified officials, and a sheriff.

"What do you mean by that?" he cried.

The sheriff was Morton, and the most worthy judges were other members of his gang.

This move tickled Danny Randall's sense of humor immensely.

"That's good headwork," he said approvingly. "I didn't think Morton had it in him."

"It's time something was done to run that gang out of town," fumed Dr. Rankin.

"No; it is not time," denied Danny, "any more than it was time when you and Johnny and the rest of you had your celebrated jury trial."

"I'd like to know what you are driving at!" fretted the worthy doctor.

Danny Randall laughed in his gentle little fashion. I will confess that just at that time I was very decidedly wondering what Danny Randall was at. In fact, at moments I was strongly inclined to doubt his affiliations. He seemed to stand in an absolutely neutral position, inclining to neither side.

Tom Cleveland was killed in the open street by one of the Empire hangers-on. The man was promptly arrested by Morton in his capacity of sheriff and confined in chains. Morton as sheriff selected those who were to serve on the jury. I had the curiosity to attend the trial, expecting to assist at an uproarious farce. All the proceedings, on the contrary, were conducted with the greatest decorum and with minute attention to legal formalities. The assassin, however, was acquitted.

From that time the outrages increased in number and in boldness. No man known to be possessed of any quantity of gold was safe. It was dangerous to walk alone after dark, to hunt alone in the mountains, to live alone. Every man carried his treasure about with him everywhere he went. No man dared raise his voice in criticism of the ruling powers, for it was pretty generally understood that such criticism meant death.

This is a chapter I hate to write, and therefore I shall get it over with as soon as possible.

One Sunday in the middle of October two men trudged into town leading each a pack horse.

I was at the time talking to Barnes at his hotel and saw them from a distance hitching their animals outside Morton's. They stayed there for some time, then came out, unhitched their horses, led them as far as the Empire, hesitated, finally again tied the beasts and disappeared. In this manner they gradually worked along to the Bella Union, where at last I recognized them as McNally and Buck Barry, our comrades of the Porcupine. Of course I at once rushed over to see them.

I found them surrounded by a crowd to whom they were offering drinks free handed. Both were already pretty drunk, but they knew me as soon as I entered the door and surged toward me hands out.

"Well, well, well!" cried McNally delightedly. "And here's himself! And who'd have thought of seeing you here? I made sure you were in the valley and out of the country long since. And you're just in time. Make a name for it? Better call it whisky straight. Drink to us, my boy! Come, join my friends! We're all friends here! Come on, and here's to luck, the best luck ever! We've got two horse loads of gold out there—nothing but gold—and it all came from our old digging. You ought to have stayed. We had no trouble. Bagsby was an old fool!" All the time he was dragging me along by the arm toward the crowd at the bar. Barry maintained an air of owlish gravity.

"Where's Missouri Jones?" I inquired, but I might as well have asked the stone mountains. McNally chattered on, excited, his blue eyes dancing, bragging over and over about his two horse loads of gold.

The crowd took his whisky, laughed with him and tried shrewdly to pump him as to the location of his diggings. McNally gave them no satisfaction there, but even when most hilarious retained enough sense to put them off the track.

As will be imagined, I was most uneasy about the whole proceeding and tried quietly to draw the two men off.

"No, sir," cried McNally, "not any! Jes' struck town and am goin' to have a time!" in which determination he was cheered by all the bystanders. I did not know where to turn. Johnny was away on one of his trips, and Danny Randall was not to be found. Finally inspiration served me.

"Come down first and see Yank," I urged. "Poor old Yank is crippled and can't move."

That melted them at once. They untied their long suffering animals, and we staggered off down the trail.

On the way down I tried, but in vain, to arouse them to a sense of danger.

"You've let everybody in town know you have a lot of dust," I pointed out.

McNally merely laughed recklessly.

"Good boys!" he cried. "Wouldn't harm a fly!" And I could veer him to no other point of view. Barry agreed to everything, very solemn and very owlish.

We descended on Yank like a storm. I will say that McNally at any time was irresistible and irrepressible, but especially so in his cups. We laughed ourselves sick that afternoon. The Morenas were enchanted. Under instructions, and amply supplied with dust, Morena went to town and returned with various bottles. Senora Morena cooked a fine supper. In the meantime I, as apparently the only responsible member of the party, unsaddled the animals and brought their burdens into the cabin. Although McNally's statement as to the loads consisting exclusively of gold was somewhat of an exaggeration, nevertheless the cantinas were very heavy. Not knowing what else to do with them, I thrust them under Yank's bunk.

The evening was lively, I will confess it, and under the influence of it my caution became hazy. Finally, when I at last made my way back to my own camp, I found myself vastly surprised to discover Yank hobbling along by my side. I don't know why he came with me, and I do not think he knew either. Probably force of habit. At any rate, we left the other four to sleep where they would. I remember we had some difficulty in finding places to lie.

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Last Straw.

THE sun was high when we awoke. We were not feeling very fresh, to say the least, and we took some little time to get straightened around. Then we went down to the Morena cabin.

I am not going to dwell on what we found there. All four of its inmates had been killed with buckshot and the place ransacked from end to end. Apparently the first volley had killed our former partners and Senora Morena as they lay. Morena had staggered to his feet and halfway across the room.

The excitement caused by this frightful crime was intense. Every man quit work. A great crowd assembled. Morton as sheriff was very busy, and loud threats were uttered by his satellites as to the apprehension of the murderers. The temper of the crowd, however, was sullen. No man dared trust his neighbor, and yet every honest breast swelled with impotent indignation at this wholesale and unprovoked massacre. No clew was possible. Everybody remembered, of course, how broadcast and publicly the fact of the gold had been scattered. Nobody dared utter his suspicions if he had any.

The victims were buried by a large concourse that eddied and hesitated and muttered long after the graves had been filled in. Vaguely it was felt that the condition of affairs was intolerable, but no one knew how it was to be remedied. Nothing definite could be proved against any one, and yet I believe that every honest man knew to a moral certainty at least the captains and instigators of the various outrages. A leader could have raised an avenging mob, provided he could have survived the necessary ten minutes!

We scattered at last to our various occupations. I was too much upset to work, so I returned to where Yank was smoking over the fire. He had, as near as I can remember, said not one word since the discovery of the tragedy. On my approach he took his pipe from his mouth.

"Nothing done?" he inquired.

"Nothing," I replied. "What is there to be done?"

"Don't know," said he, replacing his pipe; then around the stem of it, "I was fond of those people."

"So was I," I agreed sincerely. "Have you thought what a lucky escape you yourself had?"

Yank nodded. We sat for a long time in silence. My thoughts turned slowly and sullenly in a heavy, impotent anger. A small bird chirped plaintively from the thicket near at hand. Except for the tinkle of our little stream and the muffled roar of the distant river, this was the only sound to strike across the dead black silence of the autumn night. So persistently did the bird utter its single call that at last it aroused even my downcast attention, so that I remarked on it carelessly to Yank. He came out of his brown study and raised his head.

"It's no bird; it's a human," he said after listening a moment. "That's a signal. Go see what it is. Just wander out carelessly."

In the depths of the thicket I found a human figure crouched. It glided to me, and I made out dimly the squat form of Pete, Barnes' negro slave, from the hotel.

"Lo-dee, massa," whispered he, "done thought you nevah would come."

"What is it, Pete?" I asked in the same guarded tones.

"I done got somefin' to tell you. While I ketchin' a lil' bit of sleep 'longside that white trash Mo'ton's place I done heah dey all plannin' to git out warrant for to arres' Massa Fairfax and Massa Pine and Massa Ma'sh for a-killin' dem men las' week, and I heah dem say dey gwine fer to gib dem trial, and if dey fight dey gwine done shoot 'em."

"That is serious news, Pete," said I. "Who were talking?" But Pete, who was already frightened half to death, grew suddenly cautious.

"I don' jest rightly know, sah," he said sullenly. "I couldn't tell. Jes' Massa Mo'ton. He say he gwine sw'ar in good big posse."

"I can believe that," said I thoughtfully. "Pete," I turned on him suddenly, "don't you know they'd skin you alive if they found out you'd been here?"

Pete was shaking violently, and at my words a strong shudder went through his frame, and his teeth struck faintly together.

"Why did you do it?"

"Massa Fairfax is quality, sah," he replied with a certain dignity. "I jest a pore nigger, but I knows quality when I sees it, and I don't aim to have no pore white truck kill none of my folks if I can help it."

"Pete," said I, fully satisfied, "you are a good fellow. Now get along back."

He disappeared before the words were fairly out of my mouth.

"Yank," I announced, returning to the fire, "I've got to go uptown. That was Pete, Barnes' nigger, to say that they've got out a legal warrant for the express messengers' arrest for that killing last week. Neat little scheme."

I found Danny Randall in his accustomed place. At a hint he sent for Dr. Rankin. To the two I unfolded the plot. Both listened in silence until I had quite finished. Then Danny leaped to his feet and hit the table with his closed fist.

"The fools!" he cried. "I gave them credit for more sense. Hit at Danny Randall's men, will they? Well, they'll find that Danny Randall can protect his own! Forgotten that little point, have they?"

The cool, impassive, mild little man had changed utterly. His teeth bared, the muscles of his cheeks tightened, two deep furrows appeared between his eyes, which sparkled and danced. From the most inoffensive looking creature possible to imagine he had become suddenly menacing and dangerous.

"What do you intend, Randall?" asked Dr. Rankin. He was leaning slightly forward, and he spoke in a gentle voice, but his hand was clinched on the table, and his figure was rigid.

"Do?" repeated Randall fiercely. "Why, run that gang out of town, of course!"

"I thought you said the time was not ripe?"

"We'll ripen it!" said Danny Randall.

Danny Randall issued his orders as a general would. First he sent warning word to Cal Marsh, still nursing his shoulder. Through one of his barkeepers he caused to be called to his presence four men. Three of them were miners, the fourth a lookout at the Empire. He met them in his little room quite openly, which, as I have explained, was in accordance with his usual custom. He detailed the exact situation in a few words.

"If dey fight dey gwine done shoot 'em."

"Now," he ended, "we get busy. Are you in?"

Each assented, with apparent deep satisfaction.

"Now," said he briskly, "Munroe, you go to the lower trail, near the big oak at the second crossing. Wait there. If the express messengers have not passed by tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock return here. If they do come by stop them and tell them to proceed by the cut off to the place they know of and to wait there for me. Understand?"

To each of the other four men he assigned a different watching on other trails, giving them the same instructions.

"Now git!" he finished.

After informing Yank of my projected absence I waited at the appointed place until the appointed time, then returned to the Bella Union.

"That's all right," Danny greeted my report. "They came across the Hog's Back and are now safely in hiding. Here"—he gave me a slip of paper—fresh arrivals, and four newcomers strode briskly to the fire. As the light fell on them I recognized Randall and the three express riders.

Danny kicked together the fire until it flared.

"Somebody put some more wood on this," he said in his natural voice. "We've got to see each other."

In a moment the flames were leaping. I looked about me with considerable interest to see who of the camp had been summoned. I must confess to a few surprises, such as the gambler from the Empire, but in general the gathering consisted of those whom I should have characterized as solid citizens—Barnes, the hotel keeper; Himmelwright and men of his stripe. They were all armed and all very grave and sober. Danny ran his eye over us one by one.

"Meeting come to order," he commanded briskly. "This is a vigilan

"That's all right," observed Danny with satisfaction. He lifted a paper. "Listen to this: 'We, the undersigned, agree, as we are decent men, to stand by each other to the last, to avenge the death of any one of us and to obey the orders of our leaders. And if we fail in this may God deny us mercy.' Boys," said Danny Randall earnestly, "this is serious. If we start this now we've got to see it through. We are not much on Bible oaths, any one of us, but we must promise. Frank Munroe, step forward!"

One by one Danny Randall called us forward and administered his simple oath. The fire leaped and with it the mighty shadows. Outside the circle of light the tall pines and fir trees watched us like a multitude standing witness. The men's faces were grave. There was about the roughest of them something noble, reflected from the earnest spirit of justice.

Randall had the plans all made, and he detailed them rapidly. We were to arrest four men only, and he named them—Morton, Scarface Charley, who had recovered; a gambler named Callis and Jules, the proprietor of the Empire.

"Crawford is back in town," said some one.

"Make it five then," said Danny instantly.

Next came up the vital questions of ways and means. Many were in favor of a night surprise and an immediate hanging before the desperadoes could be organized for defense. Danny had a hard time showing them good reasons against this course, but at last he succeeded.

"This must be done deliberately and publicly," he maintained. "Otherwise it fails of its effect. We've got to show

CAN YOU FEED MORE LIVE STOCK?

IF SO YOU WILL BE INTERESTED IN CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH FREIGHT CHARGES WILL BE PAID FOR YOU ON CAR LOTS.

The Ontario Department of Agriculture is anxious that the splendid crops harvested this Fall should be used to best advantage. In many cases this can be done by feeding a few more head of cattle or sheep for breeding purposes. The Department therefore calls attention to the announcement of the Federal Minister of Agriculture offering to pay freight shipment on car lots from Eastern Stock Yards to country points. Please note these facts:-

Individually or in co-operation with your neighbors you can purchase a carload of heifers or ewes or both combined and have them shipped from any eastern Stock Yard to your station without any for freight charges. You will be required to make a declaration that the stock is for breeding purposes only.

Any farmer or drover can purchase a car load of cattle for feeding purposes on the Winnipeg market and have them shipped to any country point in Ontario upon payment of only one half the usual freight charges.

Feeding at the Toronto Stock Yards available at Reduced Rates and expert assistance is at disposal of farmers.

> "Every effort should be made to bring the surplus stock of some sections to the surplus feed of others. All indications point to a steady demand for the meat supplies of this country for some time to come." —Sir William Hearst, Ontario Minister of Agriculture.

The District Representative will assist you in organizing a co-operative car for your district if desired or in giving any other information.

Sault Ste. Marie.

Alan Sullivan.

IF an author can be said to be the product of any particular district—and why not, just as much as a variety of flower, or fruit, or grain?—Alan Sullivan, the distinguished Canadian poet and novelist, should be most properly identified with Algoma, that curiously shaped county of Ontario, which stretches from the cities and settlements of the shores of Lake Huron and Lake Superior, up through the 2,900 square miles of the Mississauga Forest Reserve, to the great furtrading territories three hundred and sixty miles north, where it is bounded by the Albany River, the chief tributary of James Bay. The southern shores of this county were colonized some thirty years ago at the instance of C. P. R. agents by hardy pioneers from the older counties of Kincardine and Bruce, but the city of Sault Ste. Marie has its roots in the remoter past, as it was a trading post for the voyageurs, who travelled for the furtraders of Montreal into the far West. Alan Sullivan, whose father was Bishop of the Algoma Diocese, was at one time engineer of the work of construction and ballasting the Algoma branch of the C. P. R. between Sudbury and the Sault Ste. Marie, and uses the local color in several of his short stories. "It was fascinating," he says, "in those days to watch the psychological effect of the arrival of the track, or even of the survey party on the settlers. They brightened up, and looked at their farms with new eyes. They were in touch with the world that heretofore had seemed so distant." The bush fires, the miners, the hunters, the mail carriers, the Indian agents, and the trappers have provided rich material for Alan Sullivan's stories, some of the best of which have been collected in the volume called "The Passing of Oul-I-But." More recently he has enlarged his field, and in his latest volume "The Inner Door," he takes for atmosphere the labor movement in a small industrial town. But the town is still in Ontario, a fact that makes it all the more interesting to the Canadian reader, who takes an interest in the now rapid growth of a distinctive Canadian literature.
